

221.66

G54.E

206

The University of Chicago
Libraries

Exchange Duplicate

7/13

STUDIES ON THE OLD TESTAMENT

STUDIES ON THE OLD TESTAMENT

BY
F. GODET, D.D.
Professor of Theology, Neuchâtel

EDITED BY THE REV. W. H. LYTTTELTON, M.A.
Rector of Hagley, and Canon of Gloucester

HODDER AND STOUGHTON
NEW YORK
GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY

Y. 1200. 111
70 111
Y. 1200. 111

BS1115

G58

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

THE first suggestion of this translation was given by the Literary Churchman, which reviewed the book very favourably, and strongly recommended it for translation.

The subjects of the Essays are not uncommon; but their treatment by a foreign author, of M. Godet's high reputation for learning and originality, will, it is thought, give them some special interest for English readers. At the same time, there is nothing in them which could offend any one in respect of orthodoxy.

I have not thought it well to put my own name to the translation; for I know how unable I should have been to carry it through without much help, which has been given me by my husband, who has kindly revised the whole, and made many alterations.

I have only to add my regret that I did not see the second edition of the Études Bibliques until two of the Essays had been translated. The one on Angels, and that on the Six Days of Creation, are therefore translated from the first edition; but there do not seem to be any changes of importance made by M. Godet.

E. L.

HAGLEY RECTORY.

December, 1874.

PREFACE.

OF the six Studies contained in this volume, three—the History of Life, the Book of Job, and the Song of Songs—appeared some years ago in the Revue Chrétienne. They have been completely re-cast. Two of them—that on Angels, and that on the Four Greater Prophets—were published more recently in the Chrétien évangélique. These have not been much altered.

The essay on the Six Days of Creation is the only one hitherto unpublished.

The word Studies sufficiently expresses the reserve with which I make the assertions I do in this volume. I am not here preaching, but investigating. If God permit, the second series, devoted to some New Testament subjects, will appear next year. The Studies in the present volume present themselves to my mind as so many avenues, at the far end of each of which there shines the sacred figure of the Christ.

Those which will form the contents of the second volume will lead the reader up directly to the Person of the Saviour.

To Him, by whom and for whom are all things, I would dedicate all that is contained in these pages.

F. G.

NEUFCHÂTEL,
August, 1872.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
I. ANGELS	I
II. THE PLAN OF THE DEVELOPMENT OF LIFE ON OUR EARTH	30
III. THE SIX DAYS OF CREATION	65
IV. THE FOUR GREATER PROPHETS	139
V. THE BOOK OF JOB	183
VI. THE SONG OF SONGS	241
APPENDIX TO ESSAY IV.	333

ANGELS.

THE subject which is now to occupy us has its attractions, but also its dangers. The veil of mystery which enshrouds it constitutes its attraction. The danger to which we are exposed in treating it, is that of putting our trust, while upon ground which belongs to things divine, in a guide not adequately qualified, imagination.

In order as much as possible to avoid this danger, we shall endeavour to draw from Nature any inductions, and from History any analogies which they may offer; then, putting these results into connection with those contained in the book of Divine Revelation, we shall seek to throw light upon these several sources of knowledge by comparing each with the other. Might I but succeed in rescuing this interesting subject out of the obscurity in which it is lost in so many minds! It is no doubt a secondary, but still an important part, which these beings, who are to be the subject of our study, play in the grand drama of the work of God upon earth.

Four points will require our attention:—

1. The existence and nature of the angels.
2. The manner of their development.
3. The relations in which they stand to each other.
4. Their relation to us.

The existence of angels cannot be questioned by any one who holds fast to the contents of the Bible revelation. But for any one who rejects these revelations, or who hesitates to accept all that they teach, may we not find some reasons fitted to induce him to admit the real existence of an order of beings in some respects superior to man?

We see before us on earth three orders of living things—plants, animals, men. If we once arrive at the perception that these three classes of creatures are the first steps of the ladder in a system of beings, of which the fourth and final step, though missing in fact here on earth, is none the less imperatively demanded as necessary in theory; would it not follow from this, with great probability, that this superior order which is thus indispensable to the harmony of the whole, does really exist in some domain of creation inaccessible to our present faculties? This is precisely the conclusion for which we are about to plead.

Let us notice the relation in which the individual stands to the species in the three orders of living things which are before us in Nature, and we shall see whether this relation does not lead us naturally to suppose that that superior order which we have imagined must exist.

In the vegetable world, species only has any proper existence; the individual specimen is but its representative, nothing more, nothing less. If we put a rose into the element proper for its growth, it will there become that only which any other rose would have become if placed under the same conditions. Language applies to individuals in the plant world the term specimens. This is because they are to the species what the several impressions of a photograph are to the negative, which they reproduce precisely. Thus, properly speaking, there is but one rose,—the species rose, which lives on, and is continually re-born in the transitory apparitions by which it becomes visible to us. A plant may be compared to some single and indivisible property, where each part-owner lives upon the whole and for the whole. In the plant world the individual as such has no existence, but the species only.

In the animal world the species is still the essential thing, but the individual has already now become an independent reality by the side of, and above it. Individuality begins to shew itself above ground; but, nevertheless, the animal is governed by instinct. Now what is instinct but the power of the species manifested in the individual? Subjected to this blind and irresistible law, the individual is incapable of drawing from its own being an act of free-will, or of making a resolution which shall be properly its own. Hence the absence of responsibility, and hence also the want of progress in the animal world. The lion of our day does exactly what his ancestors did, and what his descendants will do in the remotest future. If man does not hold out a helping hand to him by training, the animal will tread over and over again the circle marked out for him by instinct. The individual lives, it is true, but as the slave of species. His gaoler does, indeed, allow him to take a few steps in his prison-yard, but never to leap its walls.

The transition from the animal to the man is marked by a complete reversal in the relations of the individual to the species. The latter does still exist in man. We speak, not without reason, of human kind. Each man owes his existence to his parents, and it is that which constitutes species. With men, as well as with animals, species is that primordial, obscure, mysterious material, out of which each individual being shapes itself. But—and herein consists the reversal of the relation—the law of instinct, even while exerting its power in man, does not govern him absolutely. Instinct is his first master, but by no means his eternal tyrant. Man can struggle against his natural appetites; he can even, with the help of conscience and reflection, overcome the solicitations of his lusts, and sacrifice them on the altar of moral obligation. The prisoner can force the doors of his cell, and escape out of his prison. And because he can, he ought to do so. The individual only becomes properly a man, in proportion as he exercises this glorious prerogative. If he neglects to do so, he remains on the level of the lower animals, and ends by even surpassing them in brutality. He is punished by becoming a victim to those instincts over which he was intended to rule. From this faculty of self-government springs the power of progress in mankind. Instinct—the cradle and temporary guardian of the individual—gives but the starting-point to his development. Once he has broken down this barrier by an act of reflective will, man sees opening before him a pathway of progress towards perfection, both for the individual and for the race.

We see, then, that species is not extinct in man, but the individual has power to free himself from its bondage, and it is his noble mission to reach the dignity of personality by subjecting the promptings of a blind and natural instinct to the higher claims of morality. Man is no longer a mere specimen of a class, he is a person.

On comparing these three forms of existence which we perceive in nature around us, there would appear to be evidently a law by which the preponderance of individuality bears an ever-increasing proportion to that of a species. In the first stage, individuality has no existence; in the second it does exist, but is still in bondage; in the third it comes forth free, and able to effect its entire deliverance from species. May there not be a fourth state, superior even to this last, and rendering the whole system complete?

In the science of mathematics, if three terms are given, we can make out the fourth with perfect certainty. The two middle terms, being known, enable us to argue from the first to the last which is unknown. May we not then say in like manner that, among living creatures, animals and men are the two middle terms by the help of which we can rise from the first term of the series, the plant, to another and still unknown one, the very opposite and complement of the first, that is, the angel?

Having established the fact of these three forms of being: species without individuality; individuality under bondage to species; species overpowered by individuality—what have we remaining for the fourth form? Evidently, individuality without species. This formula, which seems at first sight strange to us, yet, on reflection, points to and describes a method of existence much more simple than our own: an order of beings, amongst whom, species having ceased to exist, each individual owes his existence no longer to parents like himself, but immediately to the creative will. Should we not then have exactly the angel?

This method of existence is precisely that which is attributed to these mysterious beings in Holy Scripture. In speaking of us, the term son of man is frequently used, but the angels are called sons of God, never sons of angels. Why should this be, except for this reason, that they owe their existence to a direct act of creation, and not to the ordinary means of descent? In the most explicit revelation which we have in Holy Scripture on the nature of angels, our Lord makes a remarkable comparison between the angels and the saints in glory. "The children of this world," He says, "marry, and are given in marriage; but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage. Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection^a." This declaration of our Lord gives us four very remarkable data upon the nature of angels: 1st. They have bodies, since the resurrection bodies are to be like theirs. 2nd. These bodies do not owe their existence to the ordinary process of filiation, but to an immediate act of creation; for they are compared to the bodies with which the souls of the faithful will be re-clothed at the time of the resurrection. It is in virtue of this resemblance that both alike are to bear the name "sons of God" in the life to come; "they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." 3rd. The conjugal elation will no longer exist for glorified men, any more than it exists for angels. 4th. This enfranchisement from the conjugal relation corresponds in both cases to the exemption from death. Do not, then, the exact contents of this declaration of our Lord agree, as closely as possible, with the conclusions at which we have arrived in our observations on the living creatures known to us in Nature?

So far, then, as our inductions are well grounded, and that we believe our Lord was speaking of a subject on which He could pronounce with authority, we may now consider the question of the reality and of the nature of angels as settled, and pass on to the second step, that of trying to discover what is the manner of development of these beings.

^a St. Luke xx. 34—36.

II.

We see, then, a ladder or scale before us: on the bottom step of it we have species without individuality; next above that, individuality in species; one step higher, the individual detaching himself from species; and at the top of the scale, the individual without species, that is, the angel. Below this scale of living creation, and as it were the ground upon which it rests, we have inanimate matter without either collective or individual life; and at an infinite and immeasurable height above, the Being from whose Hand it is suspended, and in whom both individual and species are but one, that is, God. The angel, then, has his place marked out and distinctly definable in the system of Nature. Can we find out something of his history? And first, with reference to the body.

The imagination of painters has clothed angels in graceful bodily forms. Do not let us materialise too much on the one hand by giving literal wings and feet to these beings, but neither let us reject the idea too contemptuously, for, as we have just seen, they have really a bodily organism, though different from our own.

If, then, they have a body, they must have a habitation. Where is it? Can it be that the angels form the population of the star-lit sky? In this way one might explain the double sense of the expression so often used in Scripture, "the Lord of Hosts," which would appear to mean both the Lord of the stars, and the Lord of Angels. This interpretation, too, gives a meaning to the petition in the Lord's Prayer, "They will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." It may be, however, that there are superior spheres of existence, distinguished from those in which we live less by distance in space than by a difference in nature and quality. When Jesus said of those whom He called "these little ones," that their angels do always behold the face of God, that is to say, that they are the beings nearest to His throne, we must not, therefore, imagine to ourselves these angels as living half-way to the nebulæ above our heads. They are at once higher and lower; higher, since they are said to be so near the throne; lower in that they are in some ways connected with those weak creatures who are the most in need of protection on this earth. The heaven in which they inhabit is not then topographically distant from our own sphere. It may be that it is diffused throughout it in the same manner as the impalpable ether pervades tangible nature.

As to the moral development of the angels, we know, in the first place, that they are free beings. This follows from the high place which they occupy in the scale of living creatures. Unfettered by the laws of species, and consequently not under the dominion of blind instinct, the angel must be even more free than man, who has to drag after him the heavy chain of collective existence, and of the involuntary solidarity of his species. Now one characteristic of all free existence is temptation. No sooner was man placed in the scene of his future activity than he was made subject to this law. The power to obey or to resist is the first gift of God to a free being, as soon as He has made Himself known as the giver of his existence, and of all the benefits which accompany it. And what is human life but a series of trials, out of each of which we emerge either more freely dependent, or more obstinately rebellious?

To surrender ourselves or to refuse to do so, to confirm from the motive of love our state of dependence, or proudly to deny it, it is in this that that progress in good or evil consists, to which the perilous prerogative of free-will forces us. If the angels are free as we are free, or even more completely so, they cannot escape from the state of probation.

We know in what the trial of man consisted. It was adapted to the initial stage of his existence, to his then infantine condition, and to his instinct of enjoyment. Shall we now endeavour to lift the veil which conceals the trial, doubtless of a very different kind, to which the angels were subjected? No, we have but to call to mind that for man himself there exist more subtle and dangerous temptations than those of the flesh; temptations of a kind purely spiritual, such as proceed from self-love, self-will, the love of praise, the abuse of intellectual superiority, the substitution of self for God in the interior worship of the soul. Now temptations of this kind are more conceivable in any being, in proportion as he is endowed with a more spiritual nature, and with more of liberty and of personal independence.

We know that the trial of the angels has taken place. Holy Scripture makes known to us the result of it, though without telling us in what it consisted. This result differs in one very material point from that in our own case. With us the race altogether is fallen, just because we are a race, and in that method of existence, the fate of all the individuals is bound together, at least according to the order of nature. Humanity is like a single tree with many branches; cut the trunk, and each branch is as completely severed from the root by that one blow, as if it had itself been struck. The case must be quite different where there is no race, no filiation, no species. The angelic host, instead of resembling a tree bearing a multitude of branches, may rather be compared to a forest, composed of a number of trees, each independent of the others. With the angels, then, trial may have had different or opposite results in different cases. And, according to Scripture, we find that this possibility became a reality. It tells us of certain angels, that they "kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation^b;" that they "abode not in the truth^c;" while to others is given the title of "holy angels^d," and "elect angels^e." The former, then, have abjured the law of their existence, the

^b Jude 6.

^c John viii. 44.

^d 1 Tim. v. 21.

^e St. Matt. xxv. 31.

will of their Creator; that is to say, they have made their own will the principle of their actions. They have thus fallen from the sphere of truth, which is only in God, into that of falsehood; their existence has become factitious, they oscillate unceasingly between illusion and imposture, alternately deceived and deceiving. For there exists no support outside of their own being to which they can attach themselves. They no longer possess God, from whom they have separated themselves, and with whom the faithful angels are still in communion; neither can they enjoy the world, with which the nature of their organs does not allow them to communicate directly^f, —that world which forms a temporary compensation for sinful men who have lost God. They live and act in the void of their own subjectivity, a void which they ever seek to people with their own lying creations. The only consolation they have for the loss of God consists in fighting against all that is good and true, and in seducing other free beings, whom they seek to drag with them into their own feverish activity, purely negative, and constantly powerless.

The holy angels, on the contrary, in conforming to the will of God, have become sharers in His power and in His truth; they are happy instruments in His hand, in that particular sphere of the universe over which each of them is set. Accordingly, the extraordinary operations of Divine power in the region of external things are attributed to them, and the Son of man speaks of His miracles as of "angels which ascend and descend." The reward of their willing submission is to be really what they were destined to be, and what their name expresses,—angels, or messengers from heaven, the agents of God. In God they possess at once both the guarantee of the reality of their existence, and that of their activity.

^f All the more do they seek to do so indirectly, through the medium of the human beings by whom they contrive to gain access to it. Hence what are called possessions.

III.

In what relation do these beings stand to one another? Do they form a hierarchy? Are they united by any kind of organization?

Nowhere upon earth do we find complete equality; and the higher we ascend in the scale of being, the more marked do we find the superiority of some, and the subordination of others. Three forms of inequality are very distinctly marked among men, which are scarcely to be found among inferior beings: in family life, the natural superiority which belongs to parents; in the State, that which belongs to rank; in society in general, that of influence.

The first of these three forms of superiority can have no existence among the angels. As regards the second, St. Paul speaks of thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers, all which terms seem to point to different de-degrees of a hierarchy. And as regards the superiority which results from personal influence, we can affirm that, even without the testimony of Scripture. For do we not find everywhere among men some who are subject to influence, and others who exert it? Human society may be compared to a pyramid, on the lowest steps of which stand the multitude, which have, strictly speaking, neither thought nor will. Next above them are those whose function it is to reproduce and publish, while themselves possessed of a certain amount of power, the word of command given to them from above. At the summit, in a narrow space reserved for a small number of elect souls, are arranged the real geniuses, those who open out new horizons to the minds of men, and new paths for their activity. These are the true potentates of humanity, burning and shining lights like Luther, or consuming fires like Voltaire. If this is the case among men, how much more must it be so among the angels, who are superior to us in intelligence and liberty. First, at the base of the pyramid are the angels properly so called, or messengers; these are, perhaps, those whom Holy Scripture calls powers; above them the principalities; then the dominions, which unite under their sceptre different groups of angels, of ascending degrees of importance; and, at the summit, there are the thrones, or, as Scripture also calls them, archangels, or chief among the angels.

Three among these latter, Scripture designates by name, two among the elect, one among the fallen angels. The two first are called Michael and Gabriel, names which express in human language the offices which they fulfil in the creation of God. The meaning of the word Michael is: Who is like unto God? In him we behold the being who is placed at the very summit of the scale of living creatures. One thought and feeling alone absorbs him, and makes the sum of his being—that of the immeasurable distance which separates him from the Creator. Himself at the very summit of all, he feels more than all others his own nothingness. Zeal for the glory of God, whom he adores whilst veiling himself, is the spring of his activity, the very principle of his existence. From this feeling arises the nature of the work he has to do, which is to overthrow everything that dares to make itself equal with God, or to oppose itself to Him, Paganism in particular, under all its various forms. In the Old as in the New Testament, Michael appears as the protector of Israel, and the champion of Monotheism, (of which this people was the depository,) and as the vanquisher of Satan, and the destroyer of his works. This archangel thus fitly preludes the final work of the Messiah as the Judge of the world.

The meaning of the name Gabriel, the second archangel of light, is the strong man, or God's hero. In him we see the active executor of God's designs for the salvation of men. Whilst Michael is occupied in overthrowing all that opposes God, Gabriel hastens the realization of His plans. It is he who appears to Daniel to announce to him the return from the captivity, and to fix the time for the still distant advent of the Messiah; it is he who, in the New Testament, announces to Mary the birth of the Saviour of the world^h. Gabriel is the heavenly evangelist; he preludes the work of the Messiah as the Saviour of the world.

If, then, there are chiefs among the elect angels, it is but natural that there should also be such among the rebel or fallen angels.

The only being of this kind whom Scripture specifies by name, is he who is called Satan,—this name, which means the adversary, is drawn from his relation to God,—and the devil, which means calumniator, or accuser, and is drawn from his relation to men. The power which Holy Scripture attributes to this being in his fallen state, is a testimony to the greatness of his position, and the excellence of his faculties before his rebellion. Besides, there is one fact which proves this; he dared to measure himself, as it were, in single combat with the Son of God. When he says to Him, while shewing Him all the kingdoms of the world, “All this is delivered to me,” there is no authority for thinking that he was not speaking the truth. Moreover, Jesus has elsewhere confirmed this assertion in calling him more than once, the prince of this world. Did our earth, then, once make part of the domain originally assigned to this monarch? Was it his fief? Did he legitimately exercise authority over it until the day when he tried to make himself lord instead of vassal? However that may be, he still inhabits a sphere superior to ours, but not far removed from it, which St. Paul speaks of as *heavenly places*¹. It is from thence that, with a multitude of other beings like himself and swayed by his influence, he exercises up to this present time an unlimited power over that portion of mankind to whom Christ's beneficent influence has not yet extended.

^h Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21; St. Luke i. 19, 26.

It has been sometimes maintained that the mention of these superior beings, both good and bad, in Holy Scripture, has been borrowed from the Babylonish and Persian religions, with which the Israelites came into contact during their captivity in the countries of the Euphrates and the Tigris. But in these religions the number of the archangels is always seven, not three. This number seven, which bears a relation to the number of the ministers of the Persian kings, we find, doubtless, in the Jewish documents subsequent to the Babylonish captivity. But Holy Scripture shews itself independent of these fables. Moreover, the two principal angels of light whom it brings before us, already appear as the companions of Jehovah at the time of His visit to Abraham, in the book of Genesis, written a long time before the Babylonish captivity. And as regards the archangel whom it reveals to us as the Prince of the kingdom of darkness, it does not make him a god, as do all the religions of the East, but a poor created being, trembling in the presence of God¹, and so much the more miserable as he had, in his former state, been richly dowered.

¹ Eph. vi. 12.

Here then, as elsewhere, the Bible maintains that independent character, which guarantees to us the originality of its sources.

IV.

We now arrive at the question which most concerns us, that of the relation which angels bear to human beings. Perhaps an analogy drawn from history may throw some light upon this delicate question. Until the advent of Jesus Christ the Israelites seemed separated by an iron wall from all other nations. The Greeks and Romans occupied the foreground of the scene, but Israel, in its retired and isolated position, appeared to bear no relation to those great actors in history. Nevertheless, a deeper study makes it apparent that on many points the progress of these nations was parallel with that of the people of God. History has progressed simultaneously with the ever-increasing influence of this unique people, until at last the moment arrived when, the barrier having fallen, the two streams, Jewish and Pagan, were re-united. It was in the Church that this confluence, which constitutes the close of ancient history, was effected. It had always been intended and predicted. From the very beginning, God's purpose was the realisation of the unity of the human race by means of the Gospel.

Zech. iii. 2 ; S. James ii. 19.

There is a unity even vaster than that of the human race, and not less positively decreed by God, that of all the beings who make up the moral universe, the kingdom of heaven in its fullest extent. Just as in the old world, God was preparing that first fusion which dates from the advent of Jesus Christ; so is He now in this present economy, ever working to prepare for that far greater and richer unity, which will be consummated at the glorious re-appearing of the same Jesus Christ.

It needs but to open one's eyes, to perceive the relations which unite the development of our race with that of those beings of whom we are now treating, relations which fit our human history into a grander whole, that of the great universal history. The temptation and the fall of the first man, and up to a certain point, the creation even of humanity, are the first events which attest the relation existing between the two spheres. If Satan was really, in his original state, the monarch to whom was entrusted the government of this Earth, and if the condition of man was that which is implied in the Divine command: Have dominion over the earth and over all that moveth upon it,—there is but one conclusion to be drawn from these facts, that is, that from that time God substituted man for Satan as the lord of the world; and that the place He intended for man in creating him, was that of a successor and a rival to Satan.

Satan was a revolted vassal, and God gave his domain to another. Man received the mission to conquer it by superiority, not of strength, but of obedience. From this point of view we understand the eagerness with which Satan has from the first laboured to draw men away from submission, and into complicity with his rebellion. What could be more attractive to a rebel than the hope of causing the army sent to overcome him to turn, and to make himself its leader against that very power who had raised it against him?

But what avail the stratagems, and even the victories of Satan against the designs of supreme Wisdom? The defection of humanity, the chef-d'œuvre of diabolic cleverness, has only served to exhibit in a more striking manner the grandeur of the Divine plan.

Through the sin of man, it is true, Satan has become provisionally the master of this earth; he has even gained one more subject. He who was to have taken away his empire is become his ally and his slave; and what degradation has he not ever since inflicted upon his unhappy captive! With what heavy chains has he not loaded him! Idolatry with its shameful practices, war with its bloody horrors, death with its inexpressible anguish, sin, above all, with its baseness and remorse; behold in all these the monuments of Satan's power over humanity, the trophies of his victory over our Earth.

And what does God do? Does He at once crush in His fury His adversary and ours? That would not be to conquer him. In a combat such as this, it is necessary to confound in order to conquer; and to confound is to shew oneself not the stronger but the better.

Do you see that little Child lying in a manger? Here is the new Champion whom God has chosen, and whom He will from henceforth oppose to the Prince of this world. Satan, himself a creature, had aspired to the independence and to the glory of a god. God detaches from Himself a mysterious Being, another self, Who willingly despoils Himself of His condition as God, and reduces Himself to the dependence and nothingness of a created Being. The archangel made himself God; the Son of God makes Himself man; the Word becomes flesh. Under the humblest form of human life, He acts out that absolute submission to God, which had been refused both by the archangel and by the first man. Satan feels now a principle in humanity which resists him; he hastens to the spot, for he perceives that his power is being threatened.

As once before he had triumphed in the garden of plenty, so now he hopes to do in the desert of privation. But this time he has met with his vanquisher. Jesus remains firm in spite of all his suggestions and his offers; He persists in referring all to God; the preservation of His bodily existence, the means of establishing His kingdom on earth, the time when He should perform His miracles, all are referred to God. The whole of His subsequent ministry is only a confirmation of this unreserved submission, to which He devoted Himself in the wilderness. And after He has consummated His expiatory and redeeming work, He is at last crowned and enthroned as the new Sovereign of the earth. It is a change of dynasty^k; the world passes into the hands of another master. Satan is deposed, and his rights of sovereignty are transferred to Jesus Christ, who in His turn transfers them to mankind, His family, in whose name, and as the representative of whom, He has fought, obeyed, conquered.

Such a transference is possible, in virtue of the solidarity of the species which is the characteristic of humanity, and which distinguishes it from angels. Inasmuch as it forms one species, humanity can be saved altogether by One. Such a method of salvation would not be applicable to the fallen angels, who have only an individual and no collective existence. Accordingly it is said that "Christ took not on Him the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham^l."

From that moment Satan and his followers have maintained a desperate fight against this new power, which was to be substituted for theirs. From the heavenly places, those superior regions where they still live, and from whence they exert their influence, they endeavour to hinder the Gospel and its progress throughout the world. But has not Christ so arranged as to make His cause one and the same with that of God? Therein is the sure guarantee of his final victory. The throne of the adversary is based in proportion as His is exalted. It is easy to see what must be the effect of this double movement.

^k S. John xii. 31.

^l Heb. ii. 16.

What part do the holy angels take in this work which God is effecting in the heart of humanity? A part both contemplative and active. They had once hailed with joyful acclamations the creation of man; as Job says, "the morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy" when man first made his appearance on the earth. Later on they were the assistants and servants of those prophets whose ministry and whose visions prepared for the coming of the Saviour. As soon as Jesus Himself appeared, they surrounded Him like a band of devoted messengers, ascending and descending at His orders, instruments of the Divine intervention in the physical world, as the Holy Spirit is of the work of salvation in the inner sphere. At the moment of the consummation of the Eternal Sacrifice, they looked down into this depth of mystery, and sought in vain to fathom it. Finally, they were the first to make known the Resurrection, as they had been the first to announce the Nativity.

Ever since the foundation of the Church, their attention has been fixed upon this masterpiece of Divine Love. They contemplate it with adoration, as a work greater than nature, a creation more glorious and enduring than that of the six days. As St. Paul says: "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers, in heavenly places, might be known by the Church the manifold wisdom of God^m." Upon this spiritual stage, the angels contemplate with an ever-renewed rapture, the manifold means by which the Father brings to the Son the hearts of sinners, and saves that which had been lost. And there is joy amongst them each time that an ineffable smile, passing over the face of the Father, makes known to them that one of His children who had been dead is now restored to life.

While thus contemplating, they learn, they grow, they rejoice, sometimes also they weep, and always they adore. But they do more than this. Once they were agents in the history of the Master; now they are so in that of His Church. "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvationⁿ?" The greatest among them do not disdain to keep specially close to the weak, and to the lowest amongst the faithful^o. Jesus Himself declares this to us, without, however, giving us any right to infer from these words that each human being has an angel personally attached to him-self.

But of what use, you will ask, is this intervention of angels? Cannot God help us by His providence and by His omnipotence, without having recourse to these created ministers? Assuredly He could do so; but to be consistent, you must also ask, Why does the new-born infant, on its entrance into life, find loving hands ready to care for and to tend it? Could not God clothe and nourish it Himself by His power? Or, again, do you ask, Why, in the danger through which you have just passed, God saved your life by means of one of your fellow-men, instead of doing so by His own Hand? The reason is, that it is not God's will that that bond, so full of sweetness, which for ever unites the benefited to his benefactor, should exist only between Him and ourselves. The love of God is great enough to make Him wish not to love, or to be loved alone. He values love, which is the very essence of His being, too highly, not to labour by every means to multiply it between all the beings He has created, as well as between Himself and them. This is the aim and end of all His dispensations, negative and positive. His love for all, that of all for Him, and of all for one another, makes the glory of His kingdom. And this is why it is His will that we should all help one another, and that this relation of mutual assistance should exist even between angels and men. Thus He prepares for the time when these two races, more widely differing than Jews and Gentiles, shall be closely united in His kingdom, and shall form but one body.

^m Eph. iii. 10.

ⁿ Heb. i. 14.

^o S. Matt. xviii. 10.

Finally, in the end of time, this relation between men and angels, first contracted at the creation, and made more intimate during their development, will be sealed by a supreme event. On the one hand,

S. Paul says that men "will judge angels^p," i.e. holy men will judge the rebel angels; on the other hand, the angels will sift the tares from the wheat among mankind, garnering up the former, and burning the latter; such is the declaration of Jesus^q.

And after each of these two classes of beings shall have thus rendered homage to the Divine holiness in the presence of the other, the end of God's dispensations to both will be realized. He who has determined to "gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are in earth^r," will join both men and angels in one under this single Head.

As, then, the two great streams in the old world, Jews and Gentiles, after successive approaches, were at last united in the Church, so the two great classes of beings of whom the moral universe is composed, men and angels, after being brought into a series of beneficent relations with each other, will submit in concert to the sceptre of Jesus Christ, the Creator and Lord of angels, the Creator, Saviour, and Lord of men, the Judge of all.

It seems, then, impossible for us to set aside the belief in the existence and agency of angels as a point of no importance. We are led up to this belief by the inductions of Nature, by the analogies of History, and by the teachings of Scripture. And who does not feel how much, from this point of view, the domain of the Divine work is extended before us, and the sphere of light enlarged? In the same way that the sight of the star-lit heavens enlarges infinitely our conception of the physical universe, so does the belief in the existence of angels give the character of infinity to the idea we form to ourselves of the kingdom of God. And how can we avoid perceiving at the same time how much this belief is fitted to give vividness to our terror, and to deepen our horror of evil? Does it not make us see in every temptation a trap laid for us by a mortal enemy, and in every sin we commit a complicity, not only criminal but senseless, with a hateful and malevolent being? Finally, do we not feel how much this belief tends to exalt the Person of our Redeemer, and to enhance His work? He is not only the Head of mankind, whom He has saved by His sufferings, but also of the angels, to whom He gave existence, and whom, from the midst of His glory, He leads to perfection.

^p 1 Cor. vi. 3.

^q S. Matt. xiii. 39.

^r Eph. i. 10; Col. i. 20.

That was a magnificent duet which resounded in the Church when, for the first time, the believers from amongst the Jews, and the converts from among the Gentiles, united their voices to sing the new song, the hymn of salvation. They both celebrated the marvellous works of God, but each in his own manner; the former praising Him above all things for His faithfulness in the fulfilment of the promises made to their fathers; the latter publishing His mercy towards the people to whom He had promised nothing, but who whatever might be their unworthiness, had notwithstanding received all^s. It will be a hymn set for two voices, even more rich and sublime, with which the elect angels and glorified men will celebrate, together, the work of God, but in differing tones; the former with that rich and sonorous voice, of which nothing has ever marred the purity, announcing the faithfulness of the Most High which so magnificently rewards their own faithfulness; the latter, in a graver tone and more restrained accent, as becomes beings whose song is born amidst tears, glorifying the grace of Him who can blot out even unfaithfulness; those, setting before us men, by their example, that ladder of light upon which it is possible to ascend to God without once departing from the truth, to attain to perfection, not without trial but without falling, to realize progress in pure good—thus glorifying the holiness and the truth of that God who does not permit that sin should ever appear to be necessary, or even in itself useful; and, on the other side, we men responding to them, and pointing in deep humility to the dark abysses of sin into which we had thrown ourselves, but from which the Hand of God has drawn us by unparalleled marvels—thus glorifying in their eyes that grace which “where sin abounded did much more abound^t,” and which, in thus transforming even evil into good, has accomplished the greatest of all miracles. From the midst of the two racés, henceforth to form but one, there will then rise, in varying tones, that united hymn (last word of the history of free beings), of which the song of the angels and of the shepherds on Christmas-eve was the prelude: "Praise be to God and to the Lamb who sitteth upon the throne! Alleluia!"

^s Rom. xv. 8, 9.

^t Rom. v. 20.

THE PLAN OF THE DEVELOPMENT OF LIFE ON OUR EARTH.

LIFE . . . who understands it? Who has seen it?

It is like the goddess Isis, whose veil may never be lifted by mortal hand. We take life as a fact; we ascertain its beginning, development, end; but we cannot explain it. In treating of Life we can make history, not theory.

But what a history is that of Life! how unbounded is the wealth of the manifestations of this principle which everywhere shews itself and everywhere conceals itself from sight. To attempt to give an account of life, is it not to pretend to gauge the Infinite? All the elements—air, water, earth, are saturated with life. Throw a plumb-line into the ocean; before it has reached a depth of 230 fathoms, it will have passed through eight different fauna. Climb the heights of Java; six times in a few hours will the flora be changed as by magic before your eyes. Crumble a piece of white chalk of a pound weight; the dust in your hand will contain the remains of 10,000,000 creatures. Place a drop of stagnant water under your microscope; you will soon have discovered in it a population of infusoria of which the number equals that of the human creatures who move upon the earth. But if we confine ourselves to man, what varied systems of life do we find in this one creature! what a complication of activities of all kinds in the same individual; the life of the senses, the life of the intellect, the life of the affections and desires, of the heart and of the will! Pass on from the individual to the family, to society,—new flames issue from the central fire of life; industrial and commercial life, the life of politics, of art, of science, of morals, of religion! How shall we discover order in the manifestations of all these forms of life? How discern a plan amidst this infinite multiplicity? How measure what seems to set all measure at defiance?

I see a way;—it is to try to take as our standard the being who is the most complete epitome of life as we know it up to this time, in whom we behold the result of all former developments, the centre of all its present, and the probable starting-point of all its future manifestations—man.

There is a saying of a Greek philosopher, "Man is the measure of all things." Is not that the same as if he had said: If you wish to discover the secret of the development of life, study man; for life in general is only the expansion of that which is to be found in germ, or in compendium, in man. Let us, as an experiment, set out with this thought of Protagoras. Œdipus found in man the solution of the riddle of the sphinx; let us endeavour to find in him the key to the problem of life. Let us examine his internal constitution, and see if from this preliminary study there will not spring forth a ray of light to elucidate the process of the development of life on the earth, in nature and in history.

I.

What is man?

According to the title of this essay, our course in the study of this question is marked out for us by Nature. We have to enquire, first, what man is according to the Bible, secondly, what he is according to our own observations. Once in possession of the results of this two-fold enquiry, we shall be able to enter upon the solution of the great question which we have proposed to ourselves. Perhaps we may thus discover a thread to guide us through the infinite labyrinth of life.

From the point of view of Holy Scripture, man is a composite being made up of two elements of opposite nature and origin. He is, as to his body, formed out of the dust of the earth; but in this body there exists a breath of life due to the inspiration of God Himself. "God," says the ancient book Genesis, "formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life^a." The nature of the being which resulted from the combination of these two elements is described by the expression "a living soul;" and thus, continues Genesis, "man became a living soul"—words which were reproduced by S. Paul almost literally^b. We see that this expression "living soul" is not applied to the breath of God considered in itself and as separate from the body, but that it describes man in his entirety, as the result of the union of the two contrasted elements. If Holy Scripture, speaking of the soul, undeniably puts it in more direct relation with the breath of God than with the body, it is none the less true that it only gives the name Soul to the first of these elements when looked at as the principle of life, and as the animating principle of the body (anima, âme). When that which was breathed into us is considered in itself and apart from the body, it takes the name of spirit (rouach, pneuma). Thus it is said in Ecclesiastes: "the dust shall return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." And Jesus said, after the resurrection, "a spirit (pneuma) hath not flesh and bones." The spirit then, in the Bible, means the breath of God considered as independent of the body; the soul is the same breath, in so far as it gives life to the body.

^a Gen. ii. 7.

^b "The first man Adam was made a living soul," 1 Cor. xv. 45.

By this we may understand how it comes to pass that notwithstanding the essential duality of the nature of man, the soul, in Scripture, is often distinguished from the spirit^d; and even how it is that when S. Paul wishes to describe the complete constitution of the human being, he places side by side these three words—body, soul, and spirit: "And the very

* Eccles. xii. 7; S. Luke xxiv. 39.

^d Thus, Heb. iv. 12: "The word of God is . . . sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow."

God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit, soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ*."

This is what Scripture teaches us about the internal organisation of our being. What does observation teach us on the same subject? What do I find in myself and in my fellow-beings?

First, something which is seen by others, that is, the body; secondly, something which sees others, which even does more than see them,—looks, and then reflects upon what it has seen, something to which the bodily eye acts but as a window through which it looks, while itself invisible, and behind which it meditates,—the soul. Lastly, I find in myself something of higher nature still, an instrument by the help of which my being, penetrating beyond the veil of all that either sees or can be seen, can put itself into direct contact with the infinite Author of so many marvels,—the organ of adoration which is in me, the sense of the Divine, the spirit[†].

As has been said by a Christian philosopher: "Through my body I am put into relation with nature below me; through my soul with men, my equals, around me; through the spirit, with God above me." Body, soul, and spirit,—three systems of life, and nevertheless but one person,—this is man. The ego may be compared to a charioteer having three horses abreast to drive; not,

* 1 Thess. v. 23.

† "God whom I serve with my spirit in the Gospel of His Son."—Rom. i. 9.

* M. de Rougemont.

however, that he is equally related to the three elements of which our complex nature is made up. During this terrestrial existence, which is the only one known to us by actual experience, it is to the soul that the feeling of personal identity seems to attach itself in man. It is in it that the ego dwells; consequently it is it that occupies the central position in the life of man. The two other elements seem to be its organs, intended to connect it with two worlds, one above, the other below it. By means of the body, the soul holds communion with material and terrestrial nature; through the spirit it comes into contact with the higher and divine world. At the same time that it receives the influences of these two spheres, of the one through the channel of the sensations, of the other through that of inspirations, it re-acts freely upon them; on the former by means of physical labour, on the latter through the no less energetic and efficacious labour of prayer. The passage which we have quoted from Ecclesiastes is not applicable only to the last moment of human life. The body of man is at every instant in process of returning to the earth from which it was taken, to seek in it the nourishment of its forces and the materials of its activity; and equally at every instant the spirit returns to God who gave it, in order to unite itself to Him by deep inward aspirations, to which Divine communications are the response. Hovering between these two worlds, by the help of these two organs, through which it stands related to them, the human soul is evidently so constituted as to establish between them a system of exchanges, and thus to labour at the realisation of heaven upon earth, or (which comes to the same thing) at the transformation of earth into heaven.

Observation and Holy Scripture agree then in this, —that they teach us to see in man a spirit united to a body, and which has become, by means of this union, a soul which is the centre of three kinds of life; that of a person, free and intelligent, the life of the soul, or psychical life; that of the sensations and of the organic activities, or physical life; and that of the aspirations and of heavenly communion, or spiritual life.

From the moment of his birth, man possesses the principle, or, at least, the potentiality of these three kinds of life. But they only make their appearance in him successively. First, the bodily life, the eating, drinking, and sleeping of little children. Then, after some weeks of this existence, which, looked at superficially, might appear purely animal, there shines forth one day on the face of the infant that first smile of heavenly sweetness, which reveals to the mother, as she leans over him, the soul which has by degrees been awakened by contact with her own. From the beginning that soul was there, but latent; it has only just begun to enter upon active existence, and all the richness of its future development is wrapped up in this first manifestation of its presence. At last, after an interval it may be of many years, when already the lamp of intelligence has been lit and has been casting bright beams—when the spring of the will has set itself in action with an energy which increases day by day,—one evening, after a day of happiness, or an hour of awakened affection on his mother's knees, at the moment of resigning himself to sleep, the child feels his heart opening to a love richer and purer than that with which he embraces all beings known to him, even his parents themselves. Above the father who has but just pressed him to his heart, and the mother who is even then giving him her last kiss, his eyes seek the Father of his father, the unseen Friend of his mother. And, closing his eyes, he murmurs, "I thank Thee, my God!" It is the spiritual life which has just been awakened. The organ of the Divine, which belongs to the essence of the soul, has found its object. If, in the future, its action is not restrained, and the spirit so grows in strength as to control the life of the soul which has already begun; if the soul, in its turn, succeeds in taking the government over the bodily life which is still further developed, the true hierarchy will then have established itself, and Divine order reign in the life of man.

This spectacle has been seen but once on earth, in the life of that Child of whom it was said, "And the Child grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom; and the grace of God was upon Him^b." He increased in stature; that refers to the body. He was filled with wisdom,—the knowledge of, and the will to do, right,—that is the soul. He was open to all the influences of Divine grace; there was the spirit. In this normal subordination of the body to the soul, and of the soul to the spirit, consists the harmony, the strength, the health, the well-being, the plenitude, the perfection, the verity of human existence.

^b S. Luke ii. 40.

The life of each of these three elements has its peculiar characteristics, by which it can be easily distinguished from the two others. The body is; it is born, grows, decays, without the will having any share, properly speaking, in this progress. Physical life does not control its own actions; it pours itself forth without being its own master. It is a capital which awaits its proprietor.

This expected proprietor is the soul. The distinctive characteristic of the soul, as compared with the body, is its consciousness, and its self-government by means of the intelligence and the free will with which it is endowed. However much the soul may be solicited by sensual instincts and blind appetites, it is not governed by these lower principles, except so far as it is its will to give way to them. It can, when it chooses, resist and conquer them in the name of a higher law. We cannot say of the soul simply that it is, but that it is what it wills to be; it becomes that which it decides for itself to become. But if it is thus its own master, this privilege is not granted to it in order that it may alienate its own rights by self-indulgence and weakness, nor yet that it may keep itself to itself in the narrowness and stiffness of egotism, but that it may give itself up by the free and deliberate impulse of Love. Now this, its highest act, can only be accomplished by the help of the spirit.

Just as self-government is the characteristic of the soul's life, so is self-surrender that of the life of the spirit. Under the dominion of the Holy Spirit, of that breath from on high which comes to unite itself to the spirit in man, and which secures him the mastery over the soul, and through the soul over the body, there comes a time when we cry: "O God, Thou hast made me free. I can either live to myself, or give myself up to some base master. I will do neither the one nor the other. I offer myself to Thee who art better than myself, who excellest all things. Accept henceforth of my free-will as an instrument of Thine. A sacred fire of love makes me Thy servant, and, for Thy sake, the servant of all my brethren." From this moment spiritual life not only exists, but reigns supreme, in man.

Existence, liberty, holy love, these are the characteristics of the three kinds of life which are ours either actually or potentially, and whose growth and development make up the whole sum of the life of man.

Having said this, is it possible to conceive of anything higher? Apparently not. Above simple existence there is free existence; above freedom, there is the life which, having reached the entire disposal of itself, sacrifices itself for love. Above this third form of existence we can conceive nothing,—we dare to say there is nothing, for God is Love.

Through the possession of these three kinds of life, of which the first is in contact with the lowest steps in the scale of being, the last is an emanation from the Divine essence, and the second forms the link between the two others, must not man be the summary and compendium of life in the universe? And, while discovering in ourselves these three forms of life, have we not, without suspecting it, hit upon the secret of the development of life on this our planet?

II.

1. Just as in man physical life is the starting-point, and constitutes the medium in which the awakening of the faculties of the soul takes place, so on our earth an immense and luxuriant development of organic life, vegetal and animal, preceded the appearance of the human soul, and prepared for the advent of the moral life.

Organic life has not existed from eternity on our planet. Geology determines for us in some measure the date of its beginning. Above certain ancient strata, which contain absolutely no vestige either of vegetable or animal life, we come suddenly, in certain rocks which crop out in different parts of the globe, upon the first remains of organised beings; these are algæ or crustaceans, and among the latter there is a kind bearing some resemblance to our modern wood-louse. As has been observed, the inauguration of life upon this world's stage took place in the most modest manner. To these first efforts of organised life succeeded the grand development of vegetal life, of which the carboniferous strata have preserved the remains; rich stores which, after so many millions of centuries, still supply materials to our industry. During this period, in which vegetal organisation so preponderated, animal life was slowly carrying on its upward movement. But it remained in the second rank; its true time had not yet arrived. It was only after the disappearance of this great vegetal creation that animal life developed itself, in its turn, with a marvellous power. This it did in two successive creations. The most ancient is that of which the strata of the jurassic epoch contain the remains. The principal inhabitants of the globe in this age were amphibious monsters, such as the plesiosaurus, the ichthyosaurus, the megalosaurus; then appeared other kinds no less strange, such as the pterodactyl. To this first great creation, which may be called the age of the saurian dynasties, soon succeeded another, of a character altogether different, of which the most distinctive representatives are the gigantic mammals of the tertiary period, such as the mammoths and the mastodons, those colossal creatures, of whom the last survivors seem to have been contemporaneous with the first men.

During these thousands of thousands of centuries occupied by the development of all life anterior to man, what do we find on our globe? Nothing, answers Science, but the unconscious growth of the plant, the blind appetites of the animal, and the unbridled reign of sensual life; nothing but physical birth, life, and death. Not one creature conscious of the object of its existence, or in any degree responsible for its actions. The world is still closed to moral life.

Nevertheless, we must not suppose that no law presided over the apparent irregularities of this gigantic work. A progress may be discerned in the succession of these animal forms. They approximate, step by step, to those of the present age, and especially to the human type, which is the ideal, ruling as it were, though invisibly, all this mysterious evolution. This long poem of the creation which modern science reconstructs verse by verse, canto upon canto, obeys one single idea,—that of aspiration after man. Not one of these formations, not one of these strange creatures, but makes a step in advance towards this goal aimed at from the very beginning. Just that which in our individual life is the time passed in the womb, that process of formation during which, first as a molluscous, then an amphibious, then a vertebrate creature, our physical being works out for itself the final organisation with which it is to see the light of life, such in the great work of nature has been that succession of animal forms, through which physical life has reached, by a long circuitous course, from its starting-point, the first bivalve, to its goal—man.

2. But just as in the human creature there suddenly appears, in the midst of the functions of instinctive and bodily life, as it were a ray issuing from a higher sphere, the first indication of the presence of the intelligent and free soul; so on our planet, after the long-continued labour of vegetal and animal life, the being at last makes his appearance, who, coming from another sphere, is to develope, in the midst of nature, a life independent of nature.

Man is the true Janus, the god looking two ways. On one side, he is closely connected with nature by his body. He is its compendium; for as we have just noticed, in his embryonic state he passes through all its phases. He is its goal; for we cannot find any new creation in the vegetal or animal world subsequent to the appearance of man. Finally, he is its crown; for he is its chef-d'œuvre. There are, no doubt, animals stronger than man, or in which some particular organ is brought to greater perfection than the corresponding organ in man. But in no animal are all the senses taken together so harmoniously developed, and all the proportions of the organism so admirably adjusted and combined as in him. We feel that the object of past efforts has now been reached to such a degree, that all the progress of animal life hitherto, seems to have had for its highest end the elaboration of this human body, which it was nature's mission to offer, as a perfect servant, to the free and conscious soul, its future sovereign.

At the same time that man in the phenomenon of his body closes the whole preceding work of creation, he inaugurates, by the higher life with which he is endowed, a new chapter. With the appearance of man upon the stage of the world, Nature reaches her resting-point, History begins. The violent crises which had preceded his arrival cease by degrees. The presence of this creature of a higher world seems to have the effect of bringing peace into the theatre in which he is called to play his part. Some partial convulsions, such as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and a crisis of a unique nature, the deluge, alone recal the revolutions through which life had up to this time made its way. In the midst of a Nature, the forces of which are henceforth under discipline, man begins his proper work. He contemplates the world; he feels himself distinct from it; he asserts his claims as the heir of this beautiful domain, and endeavours to take possession of it by the twofold labour of knowledge and action; he "dresses the garden," according to the Scriptural expression; he distinguishes between different objects, and exercises his powers in giving them names; he sets before himself aims, and finds means for their attainment; he modifies things in conformity with his wishes and his needs; he developes the inexhaustible resources of his intelligence and his will,—those twin-sisters, the loyal agents of all our activity. At the same time his feelings awake; his heart opens to the sweet affections of family life, and to the pure enjoyments of nature. It is the drama of the soul's life which is now beginning. What will be its end? Nature was ever aspiring after man, the free being; man aspires after a perfect existence, after God. In his intelligence he possesses an instrument capable of appropriating the secrets of universal knowledge; in his free-will, the power of being holy as God is holy, and of becoming, by that means, the agent of His omnipotent will. But this aim, so far above him, is still for him lost in the dim distance. In order to reach it, it is necessary that man should surrender himself; and in order to surrender himself, he must be his own master, and, first of all, he must conquer himself. But what is the enemy he has to conquer? The common notion is, that the obstacle in the way of our self-government is the authority of a master who imposes his laws upon us; and that is why man makes efforts to get rid of, or at all events to draw his attention away from, the thought of God. This is the deepest of delusions. The danger which threatens our liberty is much more truly the power of our lower nature, of our sensual appetites, of our instinctive tastes. Here is the true enemy of our liberty, which we must overcome for ourselves by a series of victories, of which each one is an act of self-denial. Let the natural inclination cause the spring of the will to give way for a moment under its pressure, and there is an end of liberty; man is no longer his own master, he becomes, like an animal, the slave of nature. There remains but this alternative, to be assimilated either to the gentle sheep, if his instincts are benevolent, or to the voracious saurian, if they are cruel. Created free, potentially, we ought to become so actually, by repeated victories of conscious will over blind instinct.

In order to win this victory, our will needs a support, which it can only find in a law superior to that of the appetites—in the sense of duty. A state of conflict between what is right and what is agreeable is then the situation, at once dangerous and glorious, in which man must be placed if he is to become in fact what he is by destination—a being morally free. Without this actual conflict between moral obligation and nature, man would, without even suspecting the injury he was doing himself, give way innocently to his natural inclinations, and his liberty would be forever confiscated. If there is to be an education of the human race, one of the first acts of the Divine Educator will be, to provoke a struggle between duty and pleasure, between conscious will and blind instinct. This is the meaning of that primeval trial to which man was subjected. The divine command, "Thou shalt not eat," was a protecting fence erected by a Father's hand to keep off instinct, and withstand its invasions. It was the safeguard of our free-will. What a crisis was here! If the conscious will, supported by the sense of duty, triumphed over natural inclination, then, set free thereby from the dominion of instinct, it would see opening before it a career of new conflicts and more glorious victories. But if, on the contrary, inclination triumphed, man's will was reduced to slavery; and, deprived, by this subjection, of the free disposal of himself, he would, under the dominion of the flesh, fall lower and lower. This crisis was then at once inevitable and decisive. It was for man, whatever might happen, the transition from a mere natural life to historic development.

If the Bible record, which alone has preserved for us the memory of the first temptation, had not told us what have been its consequences, the grievous experience which every man undergoes of the condition of moral slavery into which we are plunged, would bring us to the knowledge of it. Which of us has not many a time made an effort to shake off the chains of egotism and self-love in which his free will¹ is bound, with no other effect than to make him more clearly realise their weight? Which of us has not often heard the confession of S. Paul, "I am carnal, sold under sin; . . . the good that I would I do not, but the evil which I would not, that I do," breaking forth from the depths of his broken heart? Who has not uttered the sigh with which this lamentable description of the Apostle's life, before he was made free, concludes: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death¹?" This universal experience indicates clearly what was the result of that great ordeal with which the drama of human history opened: inclination triumphed over duty, and the will of man became its slave.

Humanity having thus fallen at the beginning of its course, and missed its proper destination, God might have extinguished it. But that would have been to retreat in presence of the enemy. God is raised too high above sin to fear entering into conflict with it. He has opened to man in his fallen state, as He would have done to man victorious, a pathway of development for his various faculties. He has Himself called into action the powers of the human soul in all directions. Man was to learn to know himself, and to dispose of himself, in the vitiated atmosphere of sin, just as he would have had to do in the pure atmosphere of virtue. For his intelligence, though obscured, was nevertheless not annihilated; and his liberty, though fettered, was not entirely lost. The noble calling of primitive man has remained in this respect that of fallen man also. Humanity seeking itself: this would have been, without the fall, and this has been, notwithstanding the fall, the inner meaning of human history since the time of Adam. The cynic philosopher looking for man in broad daylight with his lantern, is but the grotesque symbol of this sublime reality.

¹ Rom. vii. 14, 19, 24.

In Ancient History men often see nothing, and point out nothing, but a succession of monarchies mutually overturning one another; nothing but a series of bloody wars, leaving behind them cities in ruin and nations crushed or carried into captivity. Behind these mighty convulsions of the ancient world, men do not discern the real history,—that of humanity labouring at the work of laying hold of, and understanding itself, and travailing in birth of man,—the true man. As in the epochs anterior to man, behind the gigantic ferns, the voracious amphibians, and the monstrous quadrupeds, we recognise fundamentally one thing only: nature working its way up to man; so in the colossal monarchies which one after another, in the ages before Christ, filled the stage of history,—in the Assyrian-Babylonish world with its crushing military power,—in the Medo-Persian kingdom with its strong administrative organisation,—in the Greek race with its incomparable artistic and scientific genius,—in the Roman empire with its powerful political centralisation,—the true historian recognises one thing: humanity striving after the full development of its manifold faculties, the complete mastery of itself and of the world, man labouring to get full possession of himself, in prospect of a destiny which he does not yet clearly comprehend, that of voluntary self-surrender.

Certainly it cannot be said that four thousand years was too long for such a work. The human soul is a deep well; to sound its depths requires time. Reading Plato or Sophocles shews us how energetically the consciousness of man gave itself to this task; and when one thinks it well over, even setting aside the great confusion and entanglements brought in by sin, we shall not be astonished at this space of forty centuries granted to psychical mankind for learning to understand, and to gain the mastery over itself. But sin made this long period of preparation still more necessary. It was important that fallen man should undergo completely the humiliating experience of his condition of moral misery, and that he should learn in this severe school to recognise a twofold inability which he finds in himself: namely, first, to transform, in his own strength and without a fresh gift from God, his psychical into spiritual life, even when the former is pure; secondly, to restore his natural life to its original purity, when once it had been vitiated by sin.

But, just as in the young man who exerts in all directions the forces of his natural life, there is to be found in the deepest parts of his being a spiritual sense which aspires after a higher existence, an organ of his nature intended for intercourse with God; so amongst mankind in the ancient world there was one nation which, while all the rest were exerting the faculties of their souls, and giving themselves assiduously to the cultivation of the earth, received the higher mission of developing the spiritual aspirations which raise man above himself and the world. While the great nations of the East are giving themselves to the cruel pleasure of conquest, while the Phœnicians, governed by the sense of the useful, cultivate industry and commerce, while the Greeks are seeking to realise in their artistic and literary masterpieces the ideal of the beautiful and the true, while, finally, the Romans, following the guidance of their natural gift of practical wisdom, formulate wisely for centuries to come the idea of right, one nation is distinguished from all this psychical humanity by a religious tendency, which makes it as it were a stranger in the earth. Its chief concern is neither conquest nor industry, neither science nor the arts, no, nor even righteousness, in the purely human sense of that word. That which occupies its life is worship; it is God's claim upon man; it is the coming order of things, in which this claim of God shall be realised in the Earth; it is Jehovah Who is, and Who is coming; it is His kingdom, holy and glorious, and His awful judgment. The wise men of this nation are prophets, its artists are psalmists, its heroes labour as agents of the Most High. Raised up from time to time to re-awaken in the heart of the nation that Heaven-sent longing which is the central force of its life, but which without their help would soon die away within it, these divine messengers are for Israel just what Israel himself is commissioned to be for the rest of mankind,—the embodiment, in the midst of the psychological life of the ancient world, of the religious faculty inherent in the human soul; of the spirit in man longing to fill itself with the spirit of God. So that while God “suffered all other nations to walk in their own ways^k,” to make them learn by experience their own inability to reach the absolute Good, He places Israel under the yoke of an education at once gentle and strong, in order to preserve it from complete subjection to the flesh. While prophecy is for this nation like the spur which makes the spirited war-horse spring forward, the law is as the bridle which teaches him to restrain his impetuous movements in view of the circumstances of the present. Heathen nations have, it is true, something analogous to this. Conscience is with them “a law written in their heart¹," and from the midst of them, as well as from the heart of creation in general, there springs a sigh after that state of perfect liberty, for which man feels himself to have been made. But outside of Israel these are but spontaneous and ineffectual reactions of the moral nature of man; whilst the corresponding forces in Israel, the Law and Prophecy, are the results of a Divine education, actual and reaching its object. It is the same difference as that between an invalid under medical treatment, and one uncared for. Israel is the organ which God Himself trained for the exercise of the spiritual sense in ancient humanity; this constitutes the direct preparation for the future advent of the spiritual life; while the heathen, left to themselves, are but a negative and indirect preparation for it.

^k Acts xiv. 16.

Let us suppose man to have been without sin; then the result of these four thousand years of preparation would have been a humanity so completely understanding and mastering itself, as to be able to surrender itself, and to cast at the feet of its God the crown of a liberty which has been acquired by holiness; and God would have immediately responded to this homage by the gift of His Spirit. Sin has not absolutely defeated this result, but it has profoundly altered the form under which it has been reached. Through a long experience of its sinfulness, humanity has understood its own inability to realise for itself its own intended destiny, namely, to find God, and unite itself to Him. But it has none the less sighed, in the persons of its noblest representatives, for this glorious consummation. It has implored, as it were, upon its knees, that Divine help of which it so profoundly felt its need. It cried by the mouth of Isaiah: "Oh that Thou wouldest rend the heavens and come down^m." The Spirit did not present Himself to its imagination as a bridegroom imposed upon it by force, but as its betrothed, worthy of deepest love. And at the critical moment it found expression in those sublime words, in which the young Jewish heroine, as its representative, answered the Divine call: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to Thy wordⁿ."

¹ Rom. ii. 15.

3. This intense longing, and this courageous self-surrender, fruit of the long-sustained working of God's Spirit upon Israel, were the seeds of the coming era—of the third phase in the history of life. The new fact which then made its appearance—the existence of the Church, indicated the advent of a new period, that of the life of the Spirit, on our earth.

S. Paul has called Jesus Christ the second Adam, and the last Adam^o. There is a great wealth of thought for the heart and mind of the believer in these two epithets. As the first Adam had constituted the close here below of the development of physical life, and the opening of that of the life of the soul, so Jesus Christ, closes the development of psychical life, and inaugurates the advent of the life of the Spirit. Adam was a living soul, cast by God into the midst of the convulsions of nature, to bring into the physical creation, order, harmony, and peace. Jesus Christ the life-giving Spirit, comes from heaven to calm the tempests of the human soul; He brings order and harmony into the exercise of our faculties, and in our individual life, domestic and social, He makes the serenity of Divine order reign.

^m Isa. lxiv. 1. ⁿ S. Luke i. 38. ^o 1 Cor. xv. 45, 47.

This second Adam is also the last Adam. There is, after Him, nothing higher to look for; "That eternal life which was with the Father, was manifested unto us^p," says S. John. Jesus is the Divine life realised in man, and offering itself, in an accessible and tangible form, to be participated in by all that is called man; "the Word was made flesh^q." To drink of this fountain is to partake of the Divine Life in the measure in which it is accessible to the creature.

How did this supreme Life make its appearance? How did it develope itself in a man? How did it communicate itself to mankind?

It was under the most modest forms, as we have seen, that physical life first made its appearance upon our planet. It was also under circumstances of the deepest humility that the advent of the life of the Spirit took place, in the Person of Jesus Christ. A manger received the little Child in Whom that treasure was virtually contained; a carpenter's shop was the witness of the labours of the growing Boy; by Baptism, the symbol of impurity and death, He passed from youth into the stage of manhood, and that was also the means through which He entered upon the higher sphere which it was His mission to open to all others; an upper room, its doors shut for fear, was the centre whence the new life streamed, and whence it has been propagated since the day of Pentecost through generations and centuries.

^p 1 John i. 2.

^q S. John i. 14.

This new life only grew by degrees even in Him who was the first depository of it, and who is for ever its eternal principle. Assuredly He was master of Himself at the moment when, by His incarnation, He gave us His Divine Person as a gift. This act of self-devotion, the type and source of all Christian self-devotion, was that of a free being. But, once a man, He was, like all other men, subject to the law of moral progress; and in order to gain self-mastery, even He had to begin by conquering Himself. This was His work during the thirty years He spent in the obscurity of Nazareth. He was searching into His own nature, and foreseeing what He should be. In the Holy Scriptures He saw prefigured His Person and His work; in them He traced the outlines of a mission which He perceived to be His own. It was as a sealed letter, an instruction drawn up beforehand by His Father, which was not to be opened till He was in open sea, in the midst of the struggles and storms of His earthly existence. From the part of His life which is known to us, it is easy to argue that the parts which are unknown were not free from painful trials. The prayer which ever accompanied the tears He shed for the sins of those around Him, was one of the principal commentaries which made Him by degrees understand those sacred books which were so full of Him.

Thus did He reach the time of His moral maturity. During these first thirty years He had, as it were, recapitulated in Himself all the labour of human kind in the preceding ages. The moment when this work of preparation was completed was that in which the voice of John the Baptist called upon all the people to purify themselves by baptism, in order to prepare for the near approach of the kingdom of God. Jesus, by participating in this sacred rite with His people, brought into it what He had acquired, or rather what He had in His own Person become, through His whole preceding development; the psychological man complete, the pure and living temple for which the Holy Spirit was looking, that He might therein descend into humanity. If Jesus was in Himself the sum and crown of the whole preceding life of humanity, considered morally and intellectually, more especially was He the expression of the Jewish conscience, of that exquisite moral sense which was the fruit of the discipline of the Law, and of the ardent aspirations kindled in men by the word of prophecy. And when, at the moment when Jesus descended into the Jordan to receive, Himself, in His own way, His consecration to the kingdom of God, and the depths of His heart opened, and His prayer went up to heaven, heaven made answer; [the Spirit of God descended without measure upon this unique Being, Whose mission it was to communicate Him to mankind. That is a beautiful thought which is put by one of the apocryphal Gospels into the mouth of the Holy Spirit at this moment: "My Son, in all the prophets I have been looking for Thy coming, that in Thee I might find My rest; for Thou art My rest. Thou art My first-born Son who reignest for evermore".] Immediately, under the impulse of the Spirit, with Whom His own will had just identified itself, Jesus made Himself an offering, first to God, by His victory over the temptation in the wilderness; then to Israel, by His earthly ministry; lastly, to the world, by His expiatory sacrifice; realising thus the most generous and the most complete act of self-surrender ever accomplished by human being, or that can possibly be conceived. Absolute self-devotion to that which is greatest,—God; and at the same time to that which is meanest and most abject,—the worst of sinners; such is human life as we behold it in Jesus, and as by a Divine act He has been able to make it in His own Person. And this is indeed that spiritual life of which by nature the human soul possesses the capacity, the feeling, the presentiment, and instinct, but which it never succeeds in realising, except by that wedded union with the Holy Spirit which first consummated itself in the Christ.

After having realised this, the highest form of life,

* Gospel of the Nazarenes, quoted by Jerome.

Jesus re-ascended into His glory, not to abandon humanity to itself, and leave it nothing but the sweetest and purest of memories, but to labour at raising it to Himself, by pouring upon it, from out of His own glorified existence, that perfect life which He has Himself realised here below*. The scene of the effusion of this spiritual life is the Church, which is therefore called the Body of Christ†. The atonement completed by Christ gives to all a right to the Divine forgiveness; and the forgiveness thus obtained gives to each a new claim, the claim to the possession of the Spirit. Since the day of Pentecost Jesus has never ceased granting this highest favour to every one who can press his claim upon Him. After having expended upon us His earthly lifetime in the course of His ministry, shed for us His Blood in His death, He by His Spirit makes us sharers in His own glorified and living personality. The Holy Communion is the visible expression of this supreme gift. But the possession of the Spirit is so profoundly one with our own personal life, and presupposes so complete a surrender of our whole being, that it must imply an absolutely free act of our will. Accordingly, God, Who did not ask our consent when He was pleased to bestow upon us the life of our body and that of our soul, because these gifts were as yet only the vocation to the higher gift, acts with more reserve when about to bestow this last benefit. He limits Himself to offering it to us when the favourable moment has arrived; that is the object of the preaching of the Gospel, through the instrumentality of the Church and of the ministry which she nurtures in her bosom. If there be a Church constituted objectively, it is in order that the Spirit should be offered to all, while yet not forced upon any one. Each of us has received the gift of earthly life solely with a view to this higher destination—to receive through the Spirit the only life worthy of the name. If our souls are free and intelligent, it is that they may become voluntarily the abodes and agents of the Holy Spirit, and, through Him, of Jesus Christ glorified. If there be in us a man, it is in order that that man may manifest himself in the likeness of the Man-God². To thrust away from us this life of the Heavenly Christ, in order to keep our own psychical life, amounts to this,—that when the doors of a palace are opening before us, we choose to shut ourselves up in a prison. Or rather, it is an act of suicide of the most senseless and cruel kind. To surrender ourselves to the Spirit is to find ourselves; but in His presence to keep ourselves for ourselves is to be lost. Jesus said this in those words often repeated by Him, which express the ultimate law of every life which is truly human: “Whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for My sake shall find it³.”

* S. John xvii. 2: "As Thou hast given Him power over all flesh, that He should give eternal life to as many as Thou hast given Him."

† Eph. i. 23.

² Rom. viii. 29: “conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the first-born among many brethren;” 17, “heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ.”

³ S. Matt. xvi. 25.

4. During innumerable centuries, physical life had been freely displaying itself in Nature. In Adam was formed a bridge between this first form of existence and one more excellent, that of the free soul. During forty centuries did this latter form carry on its evolution in mankind of old. Then at last came Jesus Christ, Who effected the transition from the life of the soul to one more perfect still—that of the Divine Spirit in the human soul. For two thousand years, the flame of this spiritual life has been burning in the Church, propagating itself in every direction, wherever it finds in mankind the material needed for its support. Have we reached the end? Is possibility exhausted? It would seem so; for no higher form of life than that which Jesus realised in Himself, and which He communicates to us from heaven, is conceivable. And yet, if it were so, the cycle would not be closed. No development whatsoever is completed until, having reached its closing stage, it takes up once more its beginning, in order to lift it to the same height. There is a profound saying, “The future is but a return to the past.” Arrived at the summit of spiritual life, it is with no look of disdain that man turns back to contemplate the lower stages of existence through which he has ascended. Even the mere physical life with which he began, inspires him with no feeling of shame. Does not that also bear the impress of a Divine wisdom? Contempt for the body is no sign of a true and healthy spirituality. Jesus, set free from His body by death, did not leave it forgotten behind Him. He reclaimed it from the sepulchre, and restored it to life by the Resurrection. Even at the Ascension, on re-entering His original life of Divinity, He did not depose, but transformed it, and fitted it to become the organ of Omnipotence, and of that Divine life into the possession of which He was about to re-enter; "In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," says S. Paul*. Was it not one purpose of the transfiguration to give us a presentiment of this mystery of glory? If a grown man cannot contemplate unmoved the cradle in which his eyes first saw the light, the child of God, having reached the state of holiness, will not despise the body in which his soul first awoke to the light of individual consciousness, and in which, at a later period, his spirit became a partaker of the heavenly life. Even here below, when the Holy Spirit has made a temple of the human body, does He not ennoble its features? Does He not illumine its expression, renew its failing strength, and give support to its weakness? Now in the human body there is contained a germ, which begins to grow, through our union with the Holy Spirit, amidst the very dissolution of the body. So will that new organ of the spirit form itself, which S. Paul in his bold manner of speech calls the spiritual body. In the same way that our earthly body is here below the organ of the soul, which is the seat of our personality, so will the spiritual body be the organ of the spirit, when that shall have become our personal life. "There is," says S. Paul, "a natural body (alive with the life of a soul), and there is a spiritual body," (serving as an organ to the spirit^a). Now if by His action on this mortal body, the Holy Spirit already at times works wonders even here on earth, what will He not make of the new body, His own creation, His master-piece? St. Paul compares our present body to a "bare grain," and the future body to the plant, perfect in form and colour, which springs from this imperfect germ dropped into the earth. How great, then, will be the splendour and the vitality of this spiritual body!

✓ M. Charles Prince, Professor in Neuchâtel College.

* Col. ii. 9.

But this is not all. As in our present body we see the two systems, animal and vegetable, which are around us, converging, and in them Nature, as it is on earth, in its entirety; so will the future body be the centre of a nature renewed and glorified, freed from the law of vanity and death. The ideal after which are instinctively yearning, not men only, but, as S. Paul says, all creatures, will be realised. And physical existence, so coarse in appearance, which has been the spring and source of life on our planet, being taken up as its fellow-worker by the power of the Spirit, shall become the glorious theatre of the activity and of the virtues of its new master, the spiritual body.

^a 1 Cor. xv. 44.

Matter is not necessarily the imprisoner of the spirit, nor a hindrance to its operations. We see this in the supple, and, as we might say, omnipotent hands of the artist; we see it in the instrument by which he effects such marvellous results. Now art is but the prelude to that glory which is one day to become the crown and splendour of holiness.

To sum up what has been said. On the theatre of Nature, unconscious life has been exercised, a slave to the senses. On the stage of history, the human soul has displayed the riches of life self-conscious and free. In the Church (understanding this word in its most spiritual sense) there grew up, and has since developed itself, a new thing,—the life of holy love, realised in Jesus Christ, and by Him communicated to us. Finally, in that supreme abode which we call heaven, this perfect life, divine in its essence, human in its form, will expand and radiate through matter then glorified. Such is an outline of the development of life as we may conceive it, by adapting our own observation of facts to the scriptural revelations. How can we contemplate without admiration, this plan conceived before time was, and of which the magnificent result is to bring time back to eternity? How not recognise here the thought of Him who is “wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working^b?” How resist crying out with the Psalmist,

^b Isa. xxviii. 29.

“Lord, how great are Thy works, Thy thoughts are very deep?” S. Paul has summed up this divine plan in those few words, the key to the riddle of man’s history, and the text of all Christian philosophy*:

“FIRST THAT WHICH IS NATURAL;

AFTERWARDS THAT WHICH IS SPIRITUAL.”

* 1 Cor. xv. 46.

THE SIX DAYS OF CREATION.

AMONG all the records of Holy Scripture none has been more variously estimated than that of the Creation, with which the Book of Genesis opens. Cuvier, the founder of the science of palæontology, expresses himself as follows: "Brought up in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, but in advance of his age, Moses has left us a cosmogony, of which the accuracy verifies itself every day in a marvellous manner. Recent geological researches are in perfect agreement with the Book of Genesis as to the order in which organised beings were successively created*." On the other hand, one hears men of science declaring it henceforth impossible to establish any agreement between the facts of geology, and the picture given us in the Bible. According to them, we must consider this narrative either as the 'product of an ancient tradition, or as the result of philosophical speculation; in either case, as a composition of purely human origin. And if we descend to more popular literature, we find such sentiments as these: "Accept the Bible as the rule of belief! Must we then believe with Genesis, that God, after having created the light on the first day, rested for three nights before He produced the stars which transmit it to us? that the herbs of the field and the trees of the forest, created on the third day, can have grown without the heat of the sun, moon and stars, which were not created till the fourth day^b?" Had the narrative of Genesis its origin simply in human tradition? But men hand down to one another, by means of traditional records, the facts of which they have been witnesses. Now if it is true that man was present to the mind of God during the work of creation, as the end and object of all this great labour, it is equally true that no human eye contemplated this unique spectacle, and that no human tongue can have related its phases; "Where wast thou," says the Eternal One to Job, "when I laid the foundations of the earth? and when the sons of God shouted for joy^c?" Was this picture, then, the offspring of philosophy? But the idea of a creation, animal or vegetable, anterior to man, and developed in regular course through its diverse phases, had never entered the mind of any ancient philosopher. The very notion of creation, properly so called, is foreign to all ancient thought.*

* Discours sur les révolutions du globe.

These considerations bring us back to the idea which has pressed itself upon many scientific minds of the first rank:—it is, that as we contemplate this picture we may be really in the presence of a Divine revelation. What then? has God really spoken to men? Did He bring it about that one of their race should be a spectator of some of those scenes which preceded the existence of man here below? If so, in what form can such a communication have been made to him? And in what relation do its contents stand to the actual results of science? These are the important but difficult questions which we now propose to examine.

^b Le Progrès, organe des libéraux du Jura, 15 Mars, 1872.

* Job xxxviii. 4, 7.

I.

REVELATION.

Does the Jewish monotheism rest upon a revelation? Is the history of Israel, as a whole, a Divine work, designed as a preparation for that moral creation which Jesus Christ came to effect, and in foresight of which the first creation had already been completed? And may we suppose the special revelations accorded to the patriarchs and to the Jewish prophets, to have been the commentary which accompanied this educational work, since all education should rest upon instruction? It is in this light that the Bible represents to us the Divine revelations of which it gives an account. "Shall I hide from Abraham," God says to Himself, "shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do^d?" When it is God's purpose to accomplish here below a consecutive work, must He not of necessity, unless He is to work an infinite series of miracles, associate with Himself a certain number of free agents, who shall co-operate with Him? For that end He must first draw them to Himself; then, in order that they may work intelligently and freely, He must initiate them into His plan, so far at least as they are to participate in its fulfilment; which presupposes one or more acts of revelation.

^d Gen. xviii. 17.

One of the prophets expressed in the following words this fact, of which he felt himself the living proof: "Can two walk together except they be agreed? . . . surely the Lord God will do nothing, but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the prophets^e."

Some have tried to explain the Jewish monotheism, and all the train of convictions and hopes which accompany it, by an instinctive tendency in the Semitic family^f, or by the natural development of the human conscience, which should have taken place more rapidly in that race than in any other. But the illustrious writer who, in our time, has scrutinised more deeply than all others the secrets of the intellect and the conscience of man, by the help of the indications offered by language, M. Max Müller, has, in a masterly manner, refuted this naturalistic theory.

"Is it possible to hold," he says, "that a monotheistic instinct can have been bestowed upon all those nations who worshipped Elohim, Jehovah Sabaoth, Moloch, Nisroch, Rimmon, Nebo, Dagon, Ashtaroath, Baal, Baal-peor, Beelzebub, Chemosh, Milcom, Adramelech, Anamelech, Nibhaz and Tartak, Ashima, Nergal, Succothbenoth, the sun, the moon, the planets, and all the stars of the firmament^g?" All these names of divinities belong in fact to the pantheon of the Semitic tribes. The same author again reminds us that it is not allowable to argue from the example of an Abraham, a Moses, an Elias, a Jeremiah, that such was the general tendency of the Jewish people, since it is a fact "that this nation provoked many a time the anger of the Lord, by offering incense to other gods^h." History attests that Israel was inclined to the same polytheism, whether of a refined or gross kind, into which all the other nations fell; and that it needed a continuous effort on God's part, carried on through the instrumentality of a small number of chosen men, and by a very severe discipline effecting itself often by the most rigorous dispensations, to compel this race to resist the downward current of idolatry, in which it was by nature being carried away like all others.

^e Amos iii. 3, 7.

^f M. Renan.

^g Essais sur l'histoire des religions, par Max Müller, traduit par Georges Harris, 1872, p. 469.

Doubtless we must admit a primordial and natural revelation to the human consciousness, of the existence and of the essence of the Godhead. But, as M. Müller observes, "this first intuition of God is neither monotheistic nor polytheistic. . . . It finds expression in this article of faith: God is God, or there is a God; which does not as yet imply that there is one only Godⁱ." This last formula, which contains in itself an express denial of polytheism, goes beyond the contents of natural revelation. How are we to explain the fact that the people of Israel alone were in possession of this knowledge, and made it the basis of their national existence? Was this people gifted with high philosophic genius? By no means. M. Max

^h Müller, p. 472, 473.

ⁱ pp. 479, 481.

Müller here reminds M. Renan of his own statements, in which he denies to the Semitic nations "even that minimum of religious reflection which is necessary for the perception of the Divine unity^j."

Inasmuch as it is historically certain that all nations have raised themselves, by virtue of the religious organ with which the human soul is endowed, to faith in Deity in general, so is it equally true that Israel alone has reached to the conception of the unity of that Deity which is so universally affirmed. So M. Müller concludes by saying plainly: "perhaps we shall be asked how it came to pass that Abraham had not only that primordial intuition of Divinity, which is common to the whole race, but had attained to the knowledge of the one only God,—denying the existence of all other gods; we are ready to reply that it was owing to a special Divine revelation^k. We are not here making use of the conventional language of theology; we wish to give the term we employ its full and complete meaning. The Father of all truth chooses His prophets, and speaks to them in a voice louder than thunder. . . . We cannot admit that the expression Divine instinct is the fittest to use in describing a grace or a gift granted only to a small number of mankind, nor that it is more scientific, that is, more intelligible, than that of special revelation^l." See in the prairie that troop of wild horses disporting themselves at liberty. Not one of them has ever felt the painful pressure of the bit, nor the overmastering hand of a strong and skilful rider. Suddenly there appears in the midst of them another horse, with disciplined paces, well-knit limbs, and measured yet rapid gallop. On his back is a rider, whose hand is armed with the terrible lasso. He pursues these young, untamed horses, throws the lasso, entangles them in the fatal noose, and carries them away captive to his stud, where they are in their turn put under training. Thus it was that Jehovah, even while leaving the nations to walk after their own ways, prepared, and, as it were, trained for Himself in Israel a people, by means of whom it was His purpose, when the fulness of time should come, to draw all others to Himself. Had He not said beforehand to Abraham, when He chose him to be His servant, and his posterity to be His people: "in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed?"

^j p. 475. ^k p. 505, (the italics are our own). ^l pp. 505, 506.

Among all those whom God called to work with Him in this special training of the Jewish nation, Moses holds without doubt the first place. It was through him that the patriarchal revelation became a national religion, and received its historic character. It was through him that it disengaged itself completely from those elements of polytheism which still clung to it among the children and descendants of Abraham himself. It was through him that the name, already known but not generally used, Jehovah, was substituted for the ancient name El Shaddai, the Almighty, by which they had before addressed the God who revealed Himself to the father of the race,—the name by which God had most frequently designated Himself in ad-dressings the patriarchs. This substitution was nothing less than the starting-point of a great religious revolution. The name El Shaddai, the Almighty, left room for the existence of other powers by the side of God, subject, indeed, to His supremacy, but still able in some sort to compete with Him. This name signifies nearly the same as that which a certain class of religious persons still like to use; the Being of beings, the Supreme Being. But Jehovah signifies He who is and shall be. Jehovah, therefore, does not only mean the most powerful of beings, but the one only self-existent Being; the absolute Being, absorbing in Himself the idea of existence; the Being existing by His own Power; the Being as subject, noun and attribute in one. By the side of El Shaddai there is room for others inferior to Him; outside of Jehovah there is but non-entity. If anything does exist outside of Him, it is only through His power, and in consequence of His creative will. The worship of El Shaddai did not then expressly exclude polytheism. But the adoration of Jehovah is, in its principle, what it has become more and more in fact, the absolute divorce of the conscience from all forms of paganism, actual or conceivable. We have in Exod. iii. and vi. the simple and solemn narrative of the vision granted to Moses, in which God for the first time revealed Himself in the character of Jehovah. At that moment was laid the foundation of the Jewish monotheism^m, and of the

^m Exod. vi. 2, 3: "And God spake unto Moses, and said unto him, I am the LORD. And I appeared unto Abraham, definitive religion of mankind. But it was not only against polytheism but against its hidden principle, materialism, theoretical and practical, that the worship of Jehovah was to be thenceforth an insuperable barrier. In presence of the self-existent Being, the independent I AM, absolute, perfectly conscious of and master of Himselfⁿ—of Him Who is that which He wills to be, and because He so wills, just as truly as He wills to be that which He is, and because He is such,—how could Matter claim to possess any self-determining existence whatever? This obscure principle, akin to fate, un-selfconscious,—this brute fact without will and impenetrable by intelligence, this amorphous essence which all nations, and indeed all the wise men of old, regarded as co-existing eternally with God and independent of Him, if not in form, at least in substance,—this uncreated matter is at once and for ever set aside by the revelation of God as Jehovah, I am^o. Not only every individual being, but even the substance out of which every being is formed, has no existence but that which it pleases the free will of God to give it. And here we have the idea which was to serve as the foundation for the establishment of the Kingdom of God upon earth. With this sublime con-unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty (El Shaddai), but by My name JEHOVAH was I not known to them."

■ Exod. iii. 14: "I am that I am." This is the grammatical paraphrase of the name Jehovah; this name is in the future. [See French Bible: "je serai celui que je serai."—Tr.]

• "I am" (as a proper name) "has sent me unto you."

ception, the reign of real spiritualism, of holiness, was founded in the heart of humanity.

Does matter exist eternally and by itself? That, in the universe, which resists all the efforts of God to subdue it to Himself, how should it not defy all our endeavours to gain the mastery over it in ourselves? It hinders for ever the designs of the Creator, Whose will it is to realise on this earth the perfect Good,—the ideal of the True, the Just, the Beautiful,—and Who fails to reach His object because He meets in matter an insuperable limit to His beneficent action; and shall we, poor feeble human beings, claim the power to realise the ideal of morality, notwithstanding the resistance of flesh and blood? God, according to this, has had to limit Himself to the arranging of matter as well as possibility allowed, and the world, notwithstanding the Divine breath which He infused into it, is for Him but a pis-aller; and can He require of me that, in my small sphere, I should do more and better than He? No, if the power of matter is insuperable in the great All, it must be so also in my individual life. Let us, then, break ourselves of the folly of wishing to subjugate our senses! Let us obey without scruple the blind power before which even the Divine Majesty itself must bow! And since it must be so, let brute nature reign in the lower regions of human life!

It needs no great effort of intelligence to understand the logic which, from the principle of the eternity of matter, deduces practical materialism, the excesses of sensuality, and the degradations of egoism. This is the fatal extreme to which man is driven, when not enlightened by the revelation of Jehovah. The picture which S. Paul has drawn of the life of the nations of antiquity^p, is a frightful testimony to the irresistible force of this logical and moral chain of consequences.

Opposite to this incline, down which all the pagan nations, ancient and modern, are step by step descending, we see another, up which one nation, one alone, is gloriously ascending, which, in the Person of its last and supreme representative, succeeds at last in realising the purest spirituality, absolute holiness. By the fruit we can recognise the tree, or, if you will, the root. This name Jehovah, inscribed by Moses in letters of fire on the Jewish consciousness—it is this which has worked this prodigy. It dissipated for Israel the seductive charm of a sensual life, and secured the preponderance of spirit over matter. If God alone exists, and matter only through Him, it must be entirely subject to Him. Man is no more a slave to it than God Himself. While spelling out the name Jehovah man has recovered the knowledge of his own greatness. Made in the image of this absolute Being, of this pure Spirit, he can and he must become like Him; and henceforth the royal road is opened which leads from Moses up to Jesus Christ. Holiness is no longer an unattainable ideal; the Kingdom of God, instead of being an empty sound, becomes the one true word of history. God's plan is revealed together with His Name Jehovah. The end and aim of human life, both individual and collective, can only be the dominion of the Holy Spirit over those spirits who have freely accepted His dominion. A Jew of our own time has expressed the same thought in these words: "The eternity of matter is up to this day the foundation of the pagan idea. This principle is not only a metaphysical falsehood; it is the denial of liberty to God and man, a denial which makes an end of all morality. If any matter whatever was necessary to the Creator, He could not have formed a world absolutely good, but only the best world possible; and man can be just as little master over his own body, as God over matter. . . . But this night of darkness and of gloom which overshadows the conception of God, of the world, and of man, is dispersed at the first word of Divine revelation: 'in the beginning God created.' Everything, substance and form, came into being at the fiat of the creative will, which is free and omnipotent. And as the Creator governs the world freely, He can, by communicating to man a spark of His own life, grant to him the dominion over his own body and its forces. The created world is no longer only the best that was possible, but the only good. . . . Its very capacity for deterioration belongs to its perfection, for without it there would have been no moral liberty. . . . And the same God who has assigned to the world its purpose, will know how to make it reach its end, by means of the same free will by which He created it¹.”

^p Rom. i.

We see, then, how inevitably the preparation of the salvation of the world by Israel required as its starting-point the revelation of this fundamental verity, “I am that I am,” to which the natural intelligence of mankind could not of itself attain. Accordingly God, after having revealed to Moses this sublime idea, inscribed it on Mount Sinai at the head of the national law: “I, Jehovah, am thy God².” The fulfilment of the ancient promises made to Abraham by El Shaddai, the present work entrusted to the ministry of Moses, the future salvation of mankind to be effected by Christ, all rested definitively upon this doctrine, as the entire building, from the lowest to the highest storey, rests upon the foundation laid once for all.

We have affirmed the reality of the Mosaic revelation, and we have seen the necessity there was for it. It remains for us to learn in what form it was to be clothed in order to attain its end, which was to make intelligible and living to the Israelite consciousness this idea of the absolute existence of God, mysteriously set forth under the Name Jehovah. Was God to make of this dogma of the Divine self-existence, and the creation of matter, an answer in a catechism which the Israelitish youth would have to learn from generation to generation?

But we know too well how feeble is the barrier

¹ Der Pentateuch übersetzt und erklärt, von Raphael Hirsch.

² Exod. xx. 2.

which such a method of teaching can offer to the torrents of error and sin. Especially with the mass of mankind, if we wish to act upon their will, or even upon their mind, it is not to the intelligence only that we must address ourselves, but also to the imagination and the heart. We must not confine ourselves to teaching truth, we must also picture it. Or instead of a dogmatic formula, was God to have recourse to scientific demonstration,—to give to Moses, and through Moses to Israel, a lesson on the origin of the universe, to construct a complete and consecutive system of astronomy and geology, of physics and chemistry, of botany and zoology? Such a method would have had the double disadvantage of at the same time making science useless and faith impossible. What would be the use of study, when the revelation of all things had been made once for all by God Himself? And suppose Moses had descended from Mount Sinai, not only with the tables of the Ten commandments, but with a thoroughly exact and complete knowledge of the causes, and of the laws, which governed the formation of the universe, as, for instance, the Copernican system in detail, who would have believed so incredible a revelation? The power of sensible phenomena, the authority of prevailing prejudices, for a moment, perhaps, overcome, would soon have regained the mastery, and this inopportune revelation would have gone down to the grave with him who announced it. Faith should be a moral act, and not only the submission of the intellect.

There remained one method, that of which God made use when He revealed the future to the prophets. What did He do, for instance, in order to give Daniel an idea of the four phases through which the history of mankind was to pass before the coming of the Messiah? Did He give him an historical lecture upon the Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Medes and Persians, the Greeks and Romans? No, He caused to pass before him five pictures, or images, of which the remembrance remained indelible: a winged lion, symbol of the Babylonish power; a bear, with slow and heavy tread, emblem of the Persian majesty; a leopard with four heads, traversing the earth as on the wing, the visible representation of the Alexandrian monarchy, so rapidly founded, so speedily divided into four distinct states; then lastly, a monster with nothing corresponding to him in the terrestrial creation, trampling and devouring everything that comes in its way, image of the Roman empire, that state which has borne no resemblance to anything before known, and which absorbed everything into itself; and finally, as the last of these apparitions, the form of a Son of Man coming upon the clouds, emblem of the only really human power, of the love which comes down from heaven to found here below the kingdom of liberty and of truth. This is the manner in which God teaches history, when He thinks good to make it known beforehand to His servants the prophets. He does not discuss, He does not catechise, He pictures.

This method has the double advantage of making its appeal to man in his whole being, consequently not perverting the nature of faith, and of not rendering science superfluous by anticipating its future labours. All the researches of historians, all the discoveries of the investigators of ruins and of buried palaces, instead of being made useless by such a revelation, only serve to make more exact, and to enrich the pictures by means of which it was accomplished.

Why should not God, in making known past events which no eye had seen, have adopted the same method? Why should He not have brought before the eyes of Moses, a series of pictures summarising that work, into the principles of which He wished to initiate Him? By causing to pass before him the image of those different classes of beings, deified by paganism, and which came each in succession out of nothing at the call of God, did He not give to His people a better commentary on the Name Jehovah, in the sense which we have given to it, than He could have done by any other means? When we wish to give a nation an idea of some great victory which her sons have gained, we are not contented with a mere bulletin, which sums it up in a few lines, nor do we have recourse to a learned account of the strategic reasons for it; but we employ the most eminent artist we can find, and ask him to paint two or three of the principal scenes, which may serve as samples of thousands of others.

Such, as it appears to us, was the nature of those representations of which the record of the Creation is composed. We are told^a that during the forty days and forty nights which Moses passed upon the mount, God shewed him the model of the tabernacle which he would soon have to construct. Perhaps at the same time it was granted to him to contemplate the construction of that grand edifice—the Universe, of which the tabernacle was the type^t.

The pictures which God caused to pass before him, and of which he has preserved to us in the Genesis record such admirable photographs, could not contradict the researches of science. Revelation and Science are two rays which proceed from different sources, the one from heaven, the other from earth, but which in combination produce perfect light. The one pictures to us the idea in the mind of the great Worker, the other brings to our sight the concrete image of the work. Just in the same way that all historical discoveries only serve to enrich and complete the prophetic pictures of Daniel, so the discoveries of geology find in the retrospective pictures of Moses a frame ready fitted to receive them, and give them their right place. The Bible does not relieve science of the necessity of bringing to light the immense wealth of the facts, the relations of cause and effect, the means employed and the ends aimed at which make up their unity, and of discovering the laws which govern them.

^a Heb. viii. 5.

^t The outer court, the holy place, and the holy of holies, correspond to the earth, the heavens, and that supreme abode where God more immediately manifests His Presence.

Science, on the other hand, does not enable us to dispense with—on the contrary it demands as necessary,—that Word from on high, which shall convey to us the real meaning of this magnificent whole.

It is most important to seize the exact point of convergence of these two rays, so that the image may be formed clear and complete for the eye of human intelligence. This ideal can never be completely realised until geology on the one hand, and exegesis on the other, shall have finished their work. But it is allowable to ascertain the amount of reconciliation already reached, and to try to make one step further on the path which leads to this end.

II.

SCIENCE.

We must confine ourselves to summing up briefly the results which seem most probable, or which are most commonly received, of modern investigations relating to the formation of the globe, and the appearance of organised beings. Science brings to light, as it seems to us, ten general phases of this development. We will first briefly indicate these, and then endeavour to give some explanations on these points, while holding ourselves free to question the truth of some of them.

These principal phases appear to have been the following:—

1. The primitive gaseous state, and the formation of the solar system.
2. The condensation of the gaseous matter, and the constitution of the globe.
3. The disengagement of the primeval light.
4. The formation of the continents, and their separation from the waters.
5. The first great development of vegetable life on the continents.
6. The sun becoming visible to our earth.
7. The first great breaking forth of animal life.
8. The second great manifestation of that life.
9. The apparition of Man.
10. The cessation of the creative work.

We will developpe briefly each of these points.

Science commonly accepts the theory of La Place, according to which our solar system—and one may even say, the universe—originated in a gaseous matter of extreme rarity and tenuity. This substance must have been analogous to that of the nebulæ which the telescope even to this day discovers in the profound depths of the firmament, and which are probably only new systems in process of formation. By means of the rotatory movement with which this matter was endowed, or which had been impressed upon it, rings were successively detached from the equatorial surface of the primitive mass. By breaking up, and then folding back upon themselves, these rings would become so many distinct systems, like our own solar system. Within these again would have been produced, on a smaller scale, the same phenomenon. So that our planets would be only rings, successively disengaged from the central mass, and become so many distinct globes, arranged round the sun according to the dates at which they were severally detached. The satellites of the planets would themselves have been detached from them by the same process. And Saturn's ring would, according to this, still remain as a silent witness to this process in the formation of the worlds.

This would explain, at the same time, the distinctness of our solar system from the universe as a whole, and its internal organisation.

This gaseous matter was in an incandescent state, as is shewn by all the facts which prove that our earth must have been formed under the action of a slow and gradual cooling. Whence arose this cooling? From two causes; on the one hand, the separation of the earth from the central mass—the sun; on the other, the radiation of part of its own heat into the surrounding spaces.

No condensation of matter could have taken place at so high a temperature. The size of the gaseous globe must consequently have been infinitely greater than that of the present earth.

This theory of La Place on the formation of the earth, presents, on reflection, some difficulties, and some omissions. We will now ask the attention of the reader to these two points.

1. Whence arose this rotatory movement found in matter? Was it inherent in its essence? Why, in this case, were not its effects displayed from all eternity? How does it come to pass that we are at this day witnessing the succession of phenomena which have resulted, and which still result, from it? If the cause was eternal, it would seem that the effect produced must be eternal also. The theory of the self-movement of matter leads logically to the system of absolute immutability. The end and the middle must be as ancient as the beginning. Or, shall we say this movement was impressed from without upon matter? Then we should have to point out the agent to which so decisive an intervention is due, and to indicate the Hand which set the universe in motion, or—to use a familiar expression—gave it a fillip.

2. As in each particular system, after the successive disengagements of the rings which formed the planets, there remained a central mass, which became the sun of that system, so it would seem, it must have been with the universe. We should have to find in the celestial spaces a great central sun, to which all the other suns would stand in the relation of planets. Science has not yet answered to this demand. The hypotheses hitherto proposed have not been confirmed. The simultaneous movement of the stars seems to be due less to the attraction of one central material point, than to the influence of the reciprocal attraction of these bodies, one upon the other.

May we not suppose that, like the organic cell which explains everything but which nothing can explain, and which possesses in itself all the elements of its life, so the nebula, or aggregation of cosmical matter, emanates immediately from the creative force, with its rotatory movement and its heat, containing in its gaseous mass all the materials of its future organisation? They are there—these simple elements, these gases and metals, just as the vital forces exist latent in the cell. But they are not yet there as such. They are the ultimate atoms. Condensation alone, resulting from the process of cooling, will make them emerge from this primitive confusion.

II. Now we are at home. Our earth, detached from the sun and distinct from the other planets, forms a globe by itself, which organises itself henceforth according to its own laws. The cooling process, of which we have pointed out the causes, begins, and with it the work of condensation. One part of the materials of which the primitive mass is composed, passes from the gaseous into the liquid state, but boiling. Then, the cooling process still continuing, a solid crust forms itself on the surface of the liquid, which may be compared to the thin skin which appears on the surface of boiling milk when exposed to the contact of cold air. Here we have the beginning of that ground on which we live, and to which we give the name terra-firma.

Below this solid surface, the elements, still in a state of fusion, were stratifying themselves in the order of their density, the heaviest in the centre, the less dense in superposition above each other up to the surface.

An atmosphere of gaseous matter surrounded the globe thus constituted. But it was entirely different from our present atmosphere. For it contained, in a state of vapour, a number of elements now condensed; first, the metals which were to form the stratum nearest to the solid envelope; then bodies more easily vapourisable, such as silica, lime, sulphur; finally, those substances which are still more easily volatilised, such as the enormous mass of waters which, together with the gases that enter into their composition, form our seas.

The floor of the earth at this time had not become quite solid. Very closely submitted to the action of the internal furnace and of the gases which escaped therefrom, it must have been often agitated, lifted up, rent asunder, engulfed by that fiery sea, from the action of whose convulsions it is even now, in spite of its greater thickness, by no means altogether freed. Yet by the continual process of cooling, the solidification of matter was going on both within and without the envelope. Outside, the vapours, by condensing, formed a sea saturated with all kinds of materials, which covered this fragile floor; and on the inside, the crust gathered bulk by the condensation of those substances in a state of fusion which were the nearest to it. After each rending of the crust, it compacted itself together again with greater solidity, as the ranks of an army close up after a discharge of artillery.

What was the earth like at this period of its formation? It must have been an immense globe, of which the centre was occupied by a fiery furnace surrounded by three envelopes; the first solid,—a thin crust; the second liquid,—a sea of boiling water; the third gaseous,—an ocean of vapours. The earth would, at this time, have presented to the spectator the appearance of one of those powerful locomotives which traverse space, carrying within them a furnace, and provided with a reservoir for water, and iron walls, enveloped in an atmosphere charged with vapours.

3. All this violent working could not be carried on without evoking a great disengagement of electricity, and, consequently, of light. As a scientific man of the first rank lately wrote to us,—one whose labours have placed him at the very head of this department of science: “There could not fail to be a light produced by the powerful and numerous chemical processes which must have been at that time in operation on the surface of the earth; processes which engender electricity, and call forth luminous vibrations in the ether.”

The aurora borealis is perhaps, in our day, the phenomenon best fitted to give us an idea of this electric light, independent of the action of the sun.

The admirable experiments by which M. de la Rive has succeeded in producing, on a small scale, in his laboratory, all the phenomena of the aurora borealis are well known. It seems to be demonstrated by these experiments, that these magnificent appearances are only the result of the neutralisation, in the polar regions, of the two opposing currents of electricity. The principal source of all this mass of electricity is the contact which takes place, at the bottom of the ocean, between the water of the sea and the internal fire of the globe, and which occurs especially near the equator. Two currents are formed and directed towards the poles, one travelling underground, the other by the vapours which rise from the sea, and by way of the atmosphere. The aurora borealis is the method of their neutralisation.

If, in the present state of the world, things of this kind take place, let us imagine the time when the sea was only separated from the subterranean fire by a thin and fragile partition, and when, consequently, the communications between the two elements must have been much more frequent and more abundant than they are now. It is easy to form an idea of the incomparably greater and more powerful disengagement of electricity which must have taken place under those conditions, and consequently of the splendour and frequency of those luminous appearances, which, more or less periodically, dispersed the darkness which reigned on the earth; all the more so since, as the author I have just quoted adds, "because of the elevation and uniformity of the temperature," these luminous appearances "would not have been confined to the neighbourhood of the poles, but would have formed a kind of atmospheric aureole round the whole globe."

As the process of cooling continued, the volatilised substances which enveloped the globe were successively condensed; the densest first, and these must certainly have been the metallic vapours. Other lighter materials, such as aqueous vapours, which occupied the higher regions of space, were then condensed by contact with the colder regions, and formed a canopy of clouds, floating at a certain height above the globe. In the intervening space between this aerial ocean driven by the winds, and the liquid plain which formed nearly the whole of the terrestrial surface, and which was kept in a boiling state by the emanations from the internal furnace, was spread the atmosphere, such as we now have it, a stratum of respirable air, which had become more and more free from all the materials with which it had been until then saturated.

4. The floating masses, more or less solid, which had formed themselves on the surface of the fused coagulated sea of fire, had combined themselves into one continuous pavement. This first layer of the earth's crust had, by the increasing condensation of vapour, become entirely covered with water. The globe presented the appearance of an immense sea. Only a few solitary peaks and domes of granite raised their heads here and there above the surface of this boundless ocean. These were the first rudiments of our continents. But the rocks which emerged were soon no longer completely bare; their first clothing was a stratum of sedimentary deposits. Whence arose these deposits? From the débris of the first formed rocks, which had been rapidly dissolved or worn away by the hot waters of this primitive sea. These, the most ancient stratified rocks, are still to be seen in several places in Europe and America, wherever, not having been covered at a later age by the sea, they have not become the ground on which more recent strata have been deposited. They may be known by the absence of all remains of vegetable or animal life preserved within them. These are the monuments of the time when no organised being existed upon our globe. And, indeed, how could the evolution of life under any form have borne the degree of heat which then prevailed, or the physical and chemical conditions of such a state of things?

But we are soon brought face to face with a new and most important phenomenon. The fossils enclosed in the later stratified rocks, reveal to us the first appearance of organic life on our globe. These were principally vegetables,—algæ, and some other species of marine plants; then also some species belonging to the animal kingdom,—crustaceans and molluscs, some kinds of echinuses, corals or bivalves, humble pioneers of life upon this stage of the world. This fact puts to science the most formidable question which she can ever have to answer, that of the origin of organised life.

All life, vegetable or animal, has for its starting-point the organic cell; that is a fact which no man of science now disputes. But whence comes the cell itself? Is it the result of some happy combination of the elements of inorganic matter? or is it a sudden apparition in the midst of this,—a phenomenon entirely inexplicable without the act of a Creator?

The beautiful experiments of MM. Pasteur, Pouchet and Bastian, are well known. The result of their labours has been recently formulated by the President of the Naturalist Society in England, Sir William Thomson, in his opening address to the assembly at Edinburgh (1871). These are his words:—

“A very ancient way of thinking, to which many naturalists still hold fast, admits that by means of certain meteorological conditions, different from the present, inanimate matter may have crystallized or fermented in such a manner as to produce living germs, or organic cells, or protoplasms. But science affords us a number of inductive proofs against this hypothesis of spontaneous generation, as you have already heard from my predecessor in this chair (Mr. Huxley). A minute examination has not, up to this time, discovered any power capable of originating life, but life itself. Inanimate matter cannot become living except under the influence of matter already living. This is a fact in science which seems to me as well ascertained as the law of gravitation. . . . And I am ready to accept as an article of faith in science, valid for all time and in all space, THAT LIFE IS PRODUCED BY LIFE, AND ONLY BY LIFE.”

If, as a consequence of this candid and weighty declaration, the author supposes that the first germs of organic life may have reached our globe by means of aerolites which should have imported them from higher spheres, few readers would not smile at such a solution of the difficulty. Who would not say that such a solution, even supposing that the observed facts were in its favour, (which they are not,) is not really a solution at all; that the main difficulty is only removed a step further back, since we should still have to explain the first appearance of life in these globes, from which the aerolites are supposed to have come?

Might we not rather admit that, since the Creator has caused primitive matter to come into existence, not as one uniform substance, but composed of a certain number of irreducible elements, or "simple bodies," which, entering into the composition of the nebulæ, at once develope there their various properties, He may also have endowed it from the beginning with a certain number of organic cells, containing within themselves the latent principles of the fundamental forms of life, and destined to develope themselves in many various directions, as circumstances favoured this evolution?

5. Earthquakes, and contortions of the earth's crust became more frequent. On the one hand, the interior mass, diminishing in bulk as it condensed, the solid envelope, being no longer sufficiently supported from below, either crumpled itself, or gave way and sank. On the other hand, the subterranean fire continued to act upon it, and to split it into fissures. The mass of condensed vapours became continually greater; the quantity of water was always on the increase. Substances held in suspension were deposited in abundance on the sea bottom; then they were brought up again, borne upon their granite pavement. It is in the midst of these new settlements that we come upon traces of the first great evolution of organic life,—the relics of the carboniferous flora. Every one knows that our industry is mainly sustained by the enormous deposits of coal contained in certain strata of the earth's crust. It was at the period of which we are now speaking that these masses were deposited. It was then that that flora of luxuriant abundance developed itself, of which we are even now reaping the fruits. It impresses us not so much by the varieties of species or the richness of its colouring, as by the grandeur of its proportions. The coal-beds do not contain more than 800 species of plants, instead of the 80,000 to 100,000 of which our present flora is composed. But of what enormous size! Grasses, of kinds which are now but small marsh plants, attained to the thickness of a man's body, and to a height of 60 or 70 feet; mosses and ferns in the same proportion relatively to the corresponding plants in the present state of things; but there was not one flower of brilliant colour, not one fruit-bearing tree. This carboniferous flora has no adornment but its verdure. What conclusion can we draw from this, but that the sun's light at that time only reached our globe through a thick veil, and that this vegetation owed its power less to this solar heat than to that which came forth from the earth itself? Accordingly, the carboniferous flora was spread uniformly over the whole globe. There was at that time neither torrid nor frigid zone. The difference of climates, which is caused by the different degrees of inclination of the sun's rays to the earth's surface, did not as yet exist.

But how, it will be asked, could such a vegetation thrive without the action of the sun's rays? Recent experiments have completely solved this difficulty. It has now been proved that electric light possesses all the qualities needed for the development of the green parts of plants. M. Faminzin, in all his experiments upon algæ, has never made use of any light but that of a gas lamp^a. The author whom we have already twice quoted, also declares that electric light possesses, equally with the light of the sun, "all properties essential to vegetation."

The flora of the carboniferous strata must have displayed itself through long ages on the surface of the globe. It has been calculated that some coal-beds must have required from 700 to 800 years to form themselves, and as they often stratify themselves one over the other to a very great height, there are some carboniferous rocks, the formation of which, taken all together, must have required no less than nine millions of years.

We may picture to ourselves this long period as a series of hot damp days, like those in which agriculturists delight in the spring, at the time of the development of the young shoots. Imagine a greenhouse heated to a high degree, its glass walls blackened in such a manner as to intercept the sun's rays, and of which the principal light should be that of an electric flame; what would be the products of the vegetation under such conditions? Colossal plants, but without brilliant colouring; gigantic forms of greenish hue. Such was the carboniferous vegetation.

^a Kerasin-lampe,—Der Naturforscher, 1871, No. 4.

6. At this period there was, as it were, a pause in the development of organic life. The strata immediately above the carboniferous deposits prove that the world was, to a singular degree, stripped of animal and vegetable life. "Compared to the wealth of the carboniferous period," says the botanist Karl Muller*, "this new creation is infinitely poor." The great evolution of vegetable life is on the decline, and animal life has not yet taken its mighty spring.

The ages following witnessed a slow but total transformation in the kingdom of plants. "Then," says the same author, "began the transition between the carboniferous vegetation and the new plant world." This new evolution of vegetable life extends throughout the triassic, jurassic, and cretaceous eras, up to the tertiary period (molassic), when it reaches its completeness. It was brought about under the influence of different agents. But the principal one which we have to mention here was the direct influence of the sun's rays, which seem from this time to have acted powerfully upon the earth. In speaking of the tertiary flora and of the immense progress seen in it, M. Müller says: "I believe we must attribute this result to the solar light which, by the help of the transformation of an insular climate—misty, cloudy, and dark—into a continental climate, was enabled to penetrate more freely and to act with greater intensity. Beneath a tropical sun, vegetable life takes new developments with much greater power than under a northern and veiled sun. . . . It was, then, in the tertiary period alone that the more graceful flowers made their appearance, faithful reflections of the new era, of its azure sky, and its radiant sun."

* Les merveilles du monde végétal, (translation,) vol. i. p. 133.

As this transformation of vegetation was gradual, and, according to M. Müller himself, began in the ages which followed the carboniferous period, we have in this fact a most important revelation of the part which the sun began to play, at the end of the carboniferous era, in the development of life on our planet. The thick covering of clouds which had veiled the lamp of day during the preceding ages, had been torn asunder; its rays had now free access to the earth; henceforward it shone regularly upon our globe. And it is this great painter of Nature who, from this time using his brushes freely here below, is to begin to clothe the plants, the children of the light, with those brilliant colours which had hitherto been wanting to them.

7. The carboniferous vegetation had done a great service to the earth. It had absorbed an enormous quantity of carbonic acid, which it had converted into fuel, while, at the same time, purifying the atmosphere from that ingredient so injurious to animal life. It had thus prepared the way for the first great outbreak of this latter form of life. The masses of rock which formed the mighty layers of the jurassic and cretaceous strata, are the sepulchres of an innumerable animal population. They are not only the work of myriads of these living creatures, but these colossal stratifications, lifted later on in time into the light, are entirely composed of their remains. Ehrenberg has counted up as many as ten million minute shells in one single pound of chalk; and, as Mr. Alfred Maury says, the soldier, when he cleans his helmet with a cubic inch of tripoli, has in his hands no less than forty-one millions of animalcules; at every rub he pulverises from ten to twelve millions of fossil animals.

’ pp. 163, 164.

But in these masses of rock lie buried also the remains of other animal populations, both marine and amphibious.

By the side of the corals and the infusoria, those innumerable prolific creatures who filled the ocean and laboured unceasingly to form this ground upon which we are now ourselves working, there lived already, in the jurassic and cretaceous eras, some species of a higher order, the "petite bourgeoisie" of the time, more particularly represented by those wonderful molluscs which bear the name of ammonites, belemnites, &c. Higher still in the scale of animals, there crawled by the banks of the oceans and rivers, multitudes of tortoises and lizards, the "higher gentry" of the time. At last came the "aristocracy" of this middle age of Nature, who preyed upon these "lower orders," and made war amongst them. These were gigantic reptiles, armed with terrible weapons for attack. Such was the plesiosaurus, a lizard 40 feet long, with a head like a serpent, and a jaw 6 feet long, a swan's neck from 15 to 20 feet long, a body provided with four paws in the shape of paddles, like those of the wheels in our steam-vessels, which it used as oars, and with a thick tail, shorter than that of a crocodile, for a rudder. Then the ichthyosaurus, 30 feet long, with a slender snout like a dolphin, its jaws armed with 180 teeth, preying, as is proved by the remains found inside its body, not only upon tortoises and molluscs, but upon creatures of its own kind. Then a still stranger creature, the pterodactyl, a real flying dragon, like those of the dreams of our superstitious forefathers, which to an elongated beak-like snout, crocodile teeth, and tiger-like claws, added wings like those of a bat. There were some of all sizes, from that of a canary bird to an eagle. One has been found in England, whose extended wings measured no less than 20 feet across, while those of the great Alpine eagle do not exceed 11 feet. Later on we come to the megalosaurus, whose gigantic body, 50 feet long, lifted itself to a greater height above the sea than the elephant does above the ground. "Its teeth," says Figuier, "combine the characteristics of a sword, a knife, and a saw." Notice again the iguanodon, the most colossal of the saurians, remarkable for its nasal horn; this was an herbivorous animal.

It is also to the beginning of this saurian era that we trace the first appearance of birds. It is believed that in the same strata, footprints of gigantic wading birds, and fossils of great birds of the ostrich kind are to be found. But up to this time, with the exception of a tiny insectivorous rodent, and later on (in the chalk) a kind of opossum, no mammal nor any terrestrial animal, properly so called, makes its appearance.

8. The race of amphibious monsters dies out by degrees at the close of the jurassic and cretaceous formations. Deposits of an entirely new sort soon covered all that part of those strata, which lay at the bottom of the sea. These are the molassic beds which form so large a part of our present soil, and in which are preserved the remains of a whole new creation of animal life. Terrestrial animals, quadrupeds small and great, and domestic animals, at last make their appearance. This is the era when the dinotherium, a species of seal or elephant, armed with two hooked tusks under the lower jaw, grubs in the earth to dig up the roots and bulbs on which he feeds; when the aquatic salamander, six feet long, (whose remains were for a long time mistaken for a human skeleton,) peoples the bays of the continents; when the massive megatherium, and the mylodon, slightly smaller—both species of the ai or sloth—with snout-like muzzles and enormous claws, grub in the earth, or crawl upon the trees; when finally, as the king of that age, the gigantic elephant of America, the mastodon, with a body longer than that of the present elephant, and thicker limbs, feeding upon roots and other vegetables, prowls by the side of the rivers in the marshy lands. At this time also the first species of monkeys came into being.

A little later, at the period of transition between the tertiary and the modern age, animal life, although still different from that of our own time, continues to assume more and more of its characteristics. This is the age of the mammoth, another elephant, with long spiral tusks bent backwards, pendent ears tufted with hair, and a long black mane. The specimen of this creature found at the mouth of one of the rivers of Siberia, in a mass of ice in which it had been imprisoned, exhibited its flesh and hair in perfect preservation, and the contents of its stomach bore evidence to its favourite food, the leaves of the Siberian mélèze. The primeval massive-headed ox then inhabited the prairies. The hippopotamus and two-horned rhinoceros, the great elk, with his magnificently spreading antlers of which the two extremities were some ten feet apart, the cave-bear, troops of lions, tigers, hyenas, tapirs, peopled the forests and the plains.

9. Man did not yet exist; but all these forms, becoming more and more like those known to us, announce that his arrival upon the scene is not far off. In fact, the era of those great mammals, of whom we have just given an idea, leads us up to that solemn moment when this visible king of Nature made his appearance upon his domain. The first traces of his presence which have been discovered, place his arrival at the end of the period when the gigantic quadrupeds buried themselves in those beds of mud or of ice in which they have been preserved for us.

With man appear the first traces of intelligent activity—of industry. Tools of different kinds, made evidently for a purpose, announce the presence of Intelligence and of Liberty on this earthly stage. A new world opens itself, as that of Nature closes. The being whose creation was the goal and aim of all the work that had preceded—whose bodily organisation had been the standard and rule for all those anterior to him, the model to which they had gradually approached²—has now appeared; History—the development of a free being—begins.

10. One fact, remarkable above the rest in the history of Nature, clearly signalised this appearance of man as the intended end of all the development of which we have just sketched a picture; that is, the cessation of all production of new species in the field of vegetable or animal life, from the moment of the creation of man. The efforts of Nature seem to cease, and her productiveness to be exhausted. Thenceforward there is no further development of vegetable life except by cultivation and grafting; nor of animal life but by training and education. Nature seems to have yielded her sceptre to man, who not only sees no new creature arrive upon the scene superior to himself or who could be his rival, but who gradually extends his power over all those whom Nature had produced before him. The world may be compared to a country-house which a mother's loving hand had built, ornamented, and furnished, in prospect of the expected arrival of her beloved son. Man, the being thus expected, has no sooner appeared than all creatures throughout Nature hasten to pay him their tribute, and render homage to him as their lord.

² K. Müller: "The creation of the first vegetable cell is the first step towards the future creation of man."

III.

THE TWO COMPARED.

Having now set forth the general results of the study of geology with regard to the general question before us, let us look at the picture drawn by Moses, and note the points upon which it seems to diverge from, and those upon which there is no difficulty in harmonising it with, these scientific deductions.

Every one knows the story of the Creation in the first chapter of Genesis. Nevertheless, it may be well to summarise it here, in order to indicate its gradual progress, and to observe carefully its tendency.

Moses begins by a word of a general character, and which comprehends in itself all that follows: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This verse, however, is not a mere heading of a chapter; it indicates also an actual fact. The proper meaning of the word 'to create' (barah) is to cause that which existed only in the inner, to pass into the outer, world,—to give objective existence to that which had before been only present to the mind^a. This word created marks, then, in all cases, the fundamental act, the preliminary condition of all that follows; the production of primeval and universal matter, out of which have been formed, by means of successive steps of organisation, both the heavens and the earth.

Immediately after this general statement, the narrative takes leave of the subject of the heavens, the creation of which must certainly, in the mind of the author, have taken place simultaneously with the work to be accomplished on the earth. If he speaks again, later on, of the heavens, it is not till the fourth day, when their organisation has been completed, and they have entered into their normal relations with the earth and the living creatures upon it. It is from this point of view only that such a narrative could be concerned with them; for it does not include any system of cosmogony; it is always man whom it keeps in view.

Here, then, we have, in the first place, a denial of the independent existence of Matter, which all the systems of antiquity made to co-exist eternally with the Deity, and which, as an obstacle not to be overcome, hindered all the efforts both of God and man for realising the perfect good.

After the second verse, it is of the earth, and of the earth only, that the narrative speaks. The earth did exist, but in the form of chaos (tohou vabahou).

^a See Raphael Hirsch, Der Pentateuch, vol. i. p. 4.

This expression does not mean a state of disorder and confusion, but that state of primitive matter in which no creature had as yet a distinctive existence, and no one element stood out in contradistinction with others, but all the forces and properties of matter existed, as it were, undivided. The materials were indeed all there, but not as such,—they were only latent. However, the Creative spirit, the principle of order and life, brooded over this matter, which, like a rich organic cell, comprehended in itself the conditions, and up to a certain point the elementary principles, of all future forms of existence. This Spirit was the efficient cause, not of matter itself, but of its organisation, which was then to begin. He was the executant of each of those Divine commands, which from this time were to succeed each other, stroke after stroke, till this chaos should be transformed into a world of wonders. By the "waters" upon which this Divine virtue is said to have moved, must be meant either cosmical matter in its primitive and gaseous state (the Hebrew has no special word by which to express a gas), or else the sea, properly so called, which already, like a vast sheet, enveloped the whole globe.

The work of the three first days consists only in preparing the stage upon which Life was to appear and to exhibit itself. That of the three last will be the appearance and development of life itself—that is, of life properly so called, animal and human life. On the first day, Darkness gives way to Light; on the second, the waters to respirable air; on the third, the universal sea to dry land. These are the three necessary preliminary conditions for the appearance of vegetation, which crowns the work of the third day, and opens the way for animal life.

The first "God said" produces Light. The mention of this Divine command is sufficient to make the reader understand that this element, which was an object of worship to so many oriental nations, is neither an eternal principle nor the product of blind force, but the work of a free and intelligent will. It is this same thought which is expressed in the division of the work of creation into six days and six nights. The Creation is thus represented under the image of a week of work, during which an active and intelligent workman pursues his task, through a series of phases, graduated with skill and calculated with certainty, in view of an end definitely conceived from the first.

When it is stated expressly, (ver. 4 and 5,) that God divided the light, which He called day, from the darkness, which He called night, the author intends us to understand by that, that God, immediately after creating the light, established a periodicity in its appearance and disappearance. The day is not the light; it is a space of time illuminated, and intended for active work. The night differs in the same way from darkness; it is an interval of time darkened, and intended for repose, that is to say, for a new concentration of the forces of life. From the first appearance of light, God ordained this alternation, of which the consequences are seen to be so infinitely beneficial to all creatures, as long as they are in the condition of gradual development.

The belief has been imputed to Moses (because of the word firmament, which is used in some translations in ver. 6, 8), that the heavens formed a solid vault above the earth. But the Hebrew word rakijah (from rakah, 'to extend') indicates, on the contrary, an element capable of expansion; the word extension, therefore, is a much more accurate rendering of the Hebrew term. We may apply the word extension, in our narrative to the Infinity of Space, and understand by "the waters above," the gaseous matter out of which the stars were formed, and by "the waters below," that out of which the terrestrial globe is formed. But it is more natural to give here to the word heavens the more restricted meaning of the terrestrial atmosphere, and to apply the expression, "the waters above," to that mass of vapour which floats in the air in the form of clouds; and the expression, "the waters below," to those masses of liquid which cover a large portion of the globe. This meaning appears to be that most naturally indicated by the opposition between the waters and the land in the following verses.

The apparition of the land, and its separation from the water, is the work of the third day, (ver. 9 and 10). No sooner are these three conditions—light, air, and sunshine—given, than the first form of organised existence makes its appearance, (ver. 11 and 12); the land is covered with a carpet of grass, and richly adorned with shrubs and seed-bearing trees. On the one hand, it is to the command of God that this new form of existence is due,—“And God said;” and on the other, it is from the earth itself that it proceeds,—“Let the earth bring forth.”

The production of plants forms the transition from the work of the three first days to that of those which follow.

At the head of the work of the three last days is placed (ver. 14—18) the appearance of the sun, moon, and stars. The mention of this fact explains to us why, in the first words of the narrative, the author had spoken of the creation of the heavens as well as of that of the earth. Is this the moment when, to his mind, the organisation of the stars, or at least that of our solar system, was completed? Or does he only mean that this was the time when these stars first exerted their illuminating and life-giving power upon our earth, when they began to enter into relations with her as centres of light? This second sense appears to be more consistent with the general tendency of the narrative, and particularly with these words: “Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven.” Everything is connected with the development of animal life, and chiefly with the appearance and future activity of man: “lights which shall be for signs and for seasons, and for days and years.” If light in general is the condition of the work of the three first days, the relation of the earth to the stars, and particularly to the sun and moon, is the condition, not less indispensable, of the work of the three last days.

The description of the fifth day (ver. 20—22) brings before us the first appearance of animal life. This takes place under two principal forms,—that of the marine animals which the waters bring forth at the command of God, and that of birds. By the first must be intended, principally, fish and amphibious creatures: “God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth,” (roméseth, from ramas, literally ‘to advance by crawling’).

Thus the two first elements, air and water, are opened to life. The third, the earth, is put in possession of this gift on the sixth day (ver. 24, 25), by the production of domestic animals (behémah, ‘cattle’), reptiles (rémes, ‘that which creeps upon the earth’), and the beasts of the field (chajath haérets, ‘the wild beasts of the earth’).

Finally, on the same day, in the second part of this day, God created man, Adam, His representative here below^b. His body is no doubt taken out of the ground, like those of the animals; but God forms it with His own hand, and inspires it with a life which emanates from His own breath. Here is the master-work of that Spirit Who, in the beginning, moved upon the face of the waters. He worked upon and elaborated matter, only to make it serve, under the form of a human body, as an organ for a spirit which proceeds from Himself; for in man the Spirit reproduces Himself in the form of a creature.

^b Hirsch, in the work before quoted, instead of seeing in the word Adam a derivative from Adamah, ‘the earth,’ inverts the relation of the two words, and that for very good philological and logical reasons. He derives it from the word adam,—‘red-coloured.’

This last-mentioned being is the aim and end in particular of the work of the three last days, and, at the same time, that of the whole work taken together. Under the former head, the appearance of man in the second part of the sixth day, corresponds to the creation of plants in the second part of the third day. As plants are the ornaments of the newly-formed dry land, so man is the crown of that animal life which had gradually developed itself.

After that, the work is complete, and the rest of the seventh day puts an end, not to the Divine activity in general, but to the creative activity, properly so called. The Sabbath, the great "thus far, and no further," which puts an end to the Divine work in Nature, gives a solemn confirmation to the truth already set forth in the repeated words, "And God said,"—the truth namely, that the earth is not the result of blind and ungoverned powers—no Sabbath was to put an end to the ferment and activity of forces like these—but it is the work of an intelligent and self-governing Being, Who does all things by measure, Who sets before Himself, while working, a definite object to be attained, and Who, as soon as that object is attained, sets at rest again those productive forces which He had put in motion.

Such is the record of Genesis in its majestic simplicity. If this record is true, which admits of no doubt in the mind of any Israelite, it follows that neither Ormuzd (light), nor Vulcan (fire), nor Zeus (the air), nor Cybele (the earth), nor Apollo (the sun), nor Diana (the moon), nor the ox Apis, nor any animal, reptile, bird, or quadruped, nor any man, (pretended representative of Ormuzd, or Brahma, or Osiris,) has any right to Divine honours. The supreme attribute, self-existence, Deity, belongs to Jehovah alone.

What relation, then, does the Mosaic picture, thus understood, bear to the results hitherto reached by science?

To begin by the points of difference; there are two which strike us at the first glance.

1. Genesis speaks of days; but the periods implied by the stratifications and the fossils they contain, must each have consisted of millions of centuries.

2. According to Genesis, animal life did not begin upon the earth till after the appearance of plants, whereas the oldest strata that contain vegetable remains exhibit already some débris of crustaceans and of corals—monuments of an animal life which must have existed contemporaneously with that primitive vegetation. At the same time that the rich carboniferous flora developed itself, there existed also different species of fish, and one breathing vertebrate (the labyrinthodon).

These are differences of which we are not to deny the importance; and if we are to consider the record of Genesis as the result of Divine dictation, we must own that we should be not a little embarrassed to account for these two points, on which there seems to be a clear disagreement between the Bible narrative and the facts of science.

On the other hand, the points of resemblance are still more striking,—all the more so, because on many of these points, what is told us in the Bible being, as if designedly, in contradiction to that which we see, there would seem to be no other reasonable mode of explaining their origin.

The resemblances are these:—

1. According to ver. 2, the earth, from the moment when it may be said to have had an existence of its own, was surrounded by water. Now science affirms that the strata of which the crust of the earth is composed, were deposited in water, and that consequently, in the first ages of its organisation, the globe must have presented the appearance of a surface entirely liquid.

2. In ver. 3, Genesis assigns the creation of light to the first day, while the appearance of the sun did not take place till the fourth. It thereby defies the visible appearances which seem to make of Light an emanation from the sun. But Genesis goes still further; it assigns to the same date the commencement of the regular succession of days and nights, a succession which, nevertheless, according to the observation of all men, depends upon the daily appearance and disappearance of the sun. Accordingly, all superficial minds, from Voltaire, the genius of sarcasm, to the pygmies of the Progrès of Délemont, can never sufficiently ridicule the follies of the Mosaic record. If they were more dispassionate, they would perhaps say that however ignorant Moses may have been of their heights of science, he had two eyes as well as they; and they would ask how came he to compose a story so contrary to the most obvious probabilities. The fact is, that the results of modern science, still ignored by the savants of Délemont, render a striking testimony to the truth of the Mosaic record, and to the astonishing wisdom which characterises it.

It is now, in fact, an established truth, that Light is in its nature entirely independent of the sun. It is a vibration of the ether, in which the sun is, in our time, no doubt, the chief agent, but which may be produced by the action of many causes. Just as a tightly-stretched wire or string does not vibrate only under the action of the bow specially adapted for that purpose, but may be made to do so also without a bow, and before any bow had been invented—by the action of a simple current of air, for instance—so the ether which now vibrates regularly under the periodic action of the sun, may have formed and propagated its waves of light without the sun and before the sun. The sound of the Eolian harp bears the same relation to that of the string touched by the bow, that primitive light does to the sun. How could Moses have known what Science has only quite recently discovered, and have perceived that the sun, instead of being the source of light, is only the present and temporary instrument for its diffusion? But the other fact we have mentioned ought perhaps to astonish us still more. How can Genesis speak of an alternation of days and nights as a phenomenon anterior to the appearance of the sun? There is nothing to object to, as we have seen, in this precedence in itself. Modern science explains the fact. If ante-solar, primitive light was, like our present aurora borealis, the effect of the neutralisation, throughout the whole atmosphere, of the two opposing kinds of electricity, this light must have had its hours of dawn, of mid-day splendour, of decline, and of complete cessation. Consequently, according to the expression in the Bible narrative, there may have been, and must have been, days and nights, evenings and mornings, before ever the sun rose and set on our horizon. But at the time when Moses wrote, how was it possible for him to affirm anything of the sort? That is a question for an answer to which we may wait, and shall wait a long time. Yet the fact of the Bible narrative is here before our eyes in all its undeniable and paradoxical clearness.

3. Genesis tells us (ver. 9) that the dry land appeared in the midst of the waters, and that thus the separation was made between the land and the sea. If there is one fact more certainly proved by modern science than another, it is that the continents were gradually lifted up from the bottom of the sea.

4. Genesis speaks of a great vegetable creation, which covered the lands then just emerged. Science has ascertained, by the discovery of the carboniferous strata, that a period of colossal vegetation followed the upheaval of those primitive rocks of which the terrestrial envelope is composed. Of this the coal-beds which we work are the monuments. And if the gentlemen of the Progrès amuse themselves at the expense of Moses, for being such a simpleton as to place the growth of plants before the creation of the sun, science proves that Moses, who lived fifteen centuries before Christ, knew more about the subject than they do, living in the nineteenth century of our era. For it proves that there is a light, other than that of the sun, which possesses all the properties required by vegetation, and that this light existed at the beginning of the world.

5. Genesis makes the appearance of the sun, moon, and stars on our horizon to take place after this great evolution of vegetation. Now what has Science demonstrated? It acknowledges, in the person of M. Karl Müller, who cannot be suspected of partiality in favour of the Scriptures, that during the periods which followed that of the carboniferous vegetation, there was effected, by degrees, a transformation more and more complete, in the vegetation; which could only have been produced under the immediate action of the solar rays, hindered during the carboniferous era. A very strange hypothesis has been lately put forward, namely, that the moon may be simply that fraction of the earth's crust, which originally filled up the immense basin of the Pacific ocean. If it should ever be proved that there is any truth in this bold conjecture, we might allow, not only that the solar system became visible to the earth at the time of which we are now speaking, but that it then only really reached its present organisation, and had its relations with our globe definitively settled.

6. To the rich development of vegetable life on the third day, Genesis makes to succeed a no less mighty bursting forth of animal life, in the waters and in the air, on the fifth day. Now Science has proved, by the remains of organised beings found in the strata of the triassic, jurassic, and cretaceous periods, which followed at some distance upon that of the carboniferous strata, that a development of animal life, of marvellous richness, had taken place in the oceans at that epoch. And, more astonishing still, it is also to this age that geology assigns the date of the appearance of birds. How was Moses able thus to affirm the priority of marine and amphibious to terrestrial animals? And how can he have known the contemporaneousness of the appearance of birds, and of the inhabitants of the sea?

7. Next after the appearance of life in the waters and in the air, Genesis places the creation of terrestrial animals, of cattle, wild beasts, and reptiles. Now Science has proved that it was at the time of the molassic or tertiary formations, which were deposited immediately after the jurassic and cretaceous strata, that precisely these three classes of animals did make their appearance. According to the very exact data of M. Heer^c, the Swiss molasse has comprehended three sorts of serpents, eighteen kinds of beasts of prey and of rodents, and forty-eight species of pachyderms (herbivorous animals), and ruminants. This, then, was indeed the first great introduction into the world of terrestrial animals and mammals. It seems as if a whole multitude of his future subjects, whether independent or prepared beforehand to submit to him, hastened to appear upon the globe to meet the sovereign who was approaching.

8. The appearance of all these forms, so infinitely various, of organic life, animal and vegetable, is attributed in Genesis to a series of Divine commands: "And God said,"—without, however, thereby either denying or even omitting expressly to notice the instrumentality of natural agents, as witness the expression: "let the waters bring forth, . . . let the land bring forth." What says Science upon this point? We make no attempt here to treat the question of the permanence of species. Certainly, Moses seems to affirm this great principle, which Darwin is far from having succeeded in overturning. But from a still more general point of view, what is it that Science has in our day to do? Is it not to establish the harmony of those two equally received principles,—one, that Life can only be pro- duced by Life, (p. 92,) the other, that this engendering of life by life is governed by second causes, and requires the co-operation of the natural elements? Moses has not, it is true, given us the exact formula for this harmonisation. To work at discovering it is one of the highest tasks of Science. But has he not erected, with a bold and firm hand, the two pillars of the arch which is to form that bridge so difficult of construction? "And God said,"—there we see the principle that life alone is capable of begetting life. "Let the earth, . . . let the waters bring forth,"—there we see the co-operation of Nature freely granted. The defenders of the creative principle must not allow themselves to be drawn into denying the truth contained in these last words; on the other hand, no possible discovery in the direction of Darwinism can go beyond it.

^c Die Urwelt der Schweiz.

9. According to Genesis, the creation of man was the close of the work of creation; and this supreme act was accomplished on the same day as that of the creation of the terrestrial animals. Now modern science shews that the first vestiges of the existence of man do not make their appearance till the most recent stratifications, at the end of the tertiary period; but nevertheless they do appear in the course of that period. The sixth day did then really witness, as the Scripture tells us, the contemporaneous existence of man and of the representatives of that great animal creation which immediately preceded his arrival. There was not here the closing of one epoch and the beginning of another; it was the continuation of the same period.

10. And now let us bring out, with regard to man, one special point. Genesis affirms the creation of a single pair, from whom all mankind descended. It is not long since Science protested with all its strength against this dogma of the unity of the human race. It urged the anatomical and physiological differences of races; and affirmed in its most trenchant tones the absolute impossibility of deriving them from a single pair. And now we have this same Science not shrinking from the far more hazardous attempt of deriving from one and the same organic cell is it all mankind? No, that is not enough. Or is it all mankind and all animals together? That is still too little. It is all organised beings, even plants,—all from one single source of organised life!

Oh, Science!

The object at that time was to play tricks with Scripture upon one particular point—the unity of the human race. It is now to clear away the Divine element out of our theory of Nature. They are as ready now to swallow a camel, as they were then to strain at a gnat! And Science lends herself easily to all these contradictory services demanded of her. Docile servant, preached up in public as the queen of the world, and made in private the slave of all our caprices!

However it may be, we are now assuredly allowed by Mr. Darwin and his disciples, to maintain that the unity of the human race, proclaimed by Genesis, is no longer open to any insuperable scientific objection. The theory of the transmutation of species has indeed many another mountain to get over!

11. Genesis speaks of a Divine sabbath, a full stop placed by God Himself to His creative work; a day assigned to God's well-beloved child, just created, for rejoicing in God and becoming one with Him. And Science proves that, as a fact, with the appearance of man, the creation of all new species ceased, and that in the midst of this repose of Nature, bought at the price of such prolonged labours, that purely moral work at once began, of man seeking his Creator, and transferring to God, by worship, this world which God had set up for him by the creative act. All this present age is the sabbath, in which, the work being now completed, the master-work and the worker meet and greet one another in love.

What are we to think of such a series of points of agreement? Are they the result of accident? As well might we say that the fitting together of two cog-wheels is a mere chance. Are they the result of observation of Nature, or of philosophical speculation well directed? But what philosophical labour could have led us to the idea of light appearing and disappearing periodically, independently of the sun? And even if it had been possible to argue conclusively from simple observation that the appearance of the vegetable kingdom must have preceded that of animals, what experience could have led to the idea that the marine animals and birds appeared simultaneously, and that they preceded the terrestrial animals and reptiles; and that finally, the appearance of these last had bordered immediately upon that of man?

It has been thought by some that there is a logical symmetry in the account of the work of the six days, sufficient to account for it. On the first day, light; on the fourth, the luminaries: on the second, the waters and the atmosphere; on the fifth, marine animals and birds: on the third, the land and plants; on the sixth, land animals and man. But whatever may be thought of this parallelism, which, in order to make it more complete, would require that birds only should have appeared on the fifth day (corresponding with the creation of the atmosphere on the second day), and that the marine animals should not have come in till the sixth day, together with the land animals, (corresponding with the separation of the land and waters on the third day), the coincidence of these arrangements with the actual order of creation demands, none the less, as we have seen, some explanation other than that which any of the rationalistic hypotheses are able to give. This desired explanation we believe we have sketched out at the beginning of this essay. We must acknowledge in the Mosaic record a revelation, but not in the form of a dictation. It is, as we expected beforehand, knowledge given under the form of pictures, analogous to those of the prophetic visions. And from this point of view, the two difficulties which we mentioned at the beginning are easily explained. Moses speaks of days, and it was really periods of millions of years which were required. We will not urge here the very indefinite sense often given to the word day in Scripture, but we will say: If it was the purpose of God to cause Moses to contemplate in an abridged form the principal phases through which the work of creation passed in its gradual development, would not the best way of giving him an idea of it have been to paint each period in a single picture, which should represent in one grand scene the stage which the work had then reached? Each of these pictures was to the eye of Moses one day; but in this one day were represented all the analogous days of that same period. The interval which separated this picture from that which followed it was a night; and in this night were figured all other nights of the same period, during which the period which was to follow was being slowly prepared for. Thus there passed before his eyes these six pictures, representing the most characteristic phases of the entire work. He has preserved for us a memorial of these phases, but without having himself penetrated into their meanings in detail, any more than the prophets were able clearly to understand the intuitions excited in them by the Divine Spirit^a. He only comprehended in each picture the central idea, the only one practically wanted,—that of Jehovah as the One Being, the Author of each separate part of the work, as well as of the work as a whole.

^a 1 Pet. i. 10—12.

We can see also from the nature of this mode of instruction, that it would be only the salient features of each period which could be admitted into these pictures and strike the eye of the seer. The vegetable and animal life, for instance, which developed itself from the first at the bottom of the sea, remained concealed from him. It was only when the vegetable life made that mighty and colossal outburst of which the carboniferous strata bear evidence, that he discerned it; for then it became the essential feature of the picture. Just so with regard to the appearance of the great marine animals and of birds, in the following ages; and so again with reference to the appearance of the terrestrial animals and of man in the last period. We are looking upon a pictorial work, and not at the work of a naturalist or man of science. Placing ourselves at this point of view, we see those difficulties vanish which hindered us from finding in this record that which so many reasons make us wish to recognise in it—the result of a revelation.

To put the seal to the agreement which we have just established between the contents of the pictures in Genesis, and the results of scientific investigation, it only remains to set these latter in the frame given us by the former, and so to combine these two kinds of results into one and the same intuition, similar to that which was produced at the moment of the vision in the mind of the seer*.

We must imagine ourselves seated with the man of God upon the mountain. Darkness surrounds us. About us and within us reigns the silence which is the precursor of Divine revelations. The prophetic sense with which all men are endued by Nature, awakes in us, and just as S. John contemplates, in his trance on the rock in Patmos, the last ages of the world, and in some sort the passage of time into eternity, so we contemplate the first days of the universe, the river of time springing forth out of eternity. In the midst of the solemn darkness, our ear perceives a muffled sound, like that of the sea agitated by a mighty wind, of which the surface rises and falls in vast undulations, and the waves at times meet and break, one against the other. This is the ocean in which our earth is still enveloped as in a winding-sheet. The breath which moves it is that of the Spirit of the Creator, which broods over this mysterious egg in order to bring out of it a world of wonders, a Humanity, a Christ! We feel that this darkness is not the darkness of the grave, but that of the fertile Night, which serves as a cradle for all life. And in this darkness of a moment are concentrated centuries without number, all the ages which elapsed from the creation of matter up to the formation of the solid crust of the globe, and the condensation of the waters upon its surface.

* The following passage is borrowed in great measure from the admirable work of an English working-man, Hugh Miller, who became both one of the best geologists and one of the most brilliant writers of his country: The Testimony of the Rocks, pp. 187—191.

Suddenly, a voice breaks the silence of this long night:—

“LET THERE BE LIGHT.”

At once a luminous jet, followed by dazzling rays which radiate towards all the points of the horizon, illumines the scene. It is a radiant light, like that which from time to time illumines the inhabitants of the polar regions during their long nights of many months. By its light we discern, through the thick vapours which cover the earth, the liquid shoreless plain which surrounds us. From time to time gases, disengaging themselves from the interior furnace of the globe, make the waters surge and boil, and lift up to their surface a plain, which soon sinks down again, and is once more swallowed up. The jets of light lose by degrees their brilliancy, and, paling more and more, end in being altogether extinguished. We now hear nothing but the roar of the mighty waters on every side of us. Darkness surrounds us. And in this single day we have contemplated the representative of millions of days, which lit up our earth before any eye of man was there to discern them.

The voice sounds once more:—

“LET THERE BE A FIRMAMENT IN THE MIDST OF THE WATERS, AND LET IT DIVIDE THE WATERS FROM THE WATERS.”

Once more it is day; our eyes wander still over a liquid plain which mingles on all sides with the horizon. Perhaps there may be life in the midst of this sea, life both animal and vegetable, but we do not perceive it. That which now absorbs our attention is the gradual transformation taking place in the space above the ocean. Before, the vapours rose from the sea as out of a cauldron of boiling water, and the glittering light furrowed these dark water-spouts. Now the sea appears more calm; a thicker partition separates it, no doubt, from the subterranean fire. Its tepid waters, moved by a gentle breeze, rise and fall in regular undulations. The less dense vapours rise more lightly into the higher regions, and when they there encounter a colder temperature they form themselves into thick clouds, which remain suspended all round the globe. Below this dark covering, between it and the sea, appears for the first time the transparent atmosphere, the azure firmament which divides the aerial sea from the liquid plain. Such was the second day, in the picture of which is concentrated the image of millions of days.

We are once more plunged into darkness, but not without a presentiment of the approach of a greater work still. The voice says:—

“LET THE WATERS UNDER THE HEAVEN BE GATHERED TOGETHER INTO ONE PLACE, AND LET THE DRY LAND APPEAR!”

For the third time the scene is lighted up. The canopy of thick clouds suspended around the globe is not yet dissipated. But upon the stage below, what changes have taken place! The ocean is no longer one uniform sheet in which our eyes sought in vain for a point to rest upon. The waves dash themselves against rocks, some pointed, some dome-like. Long lines of white foam indicate the presence of coral islands, on a level with the surface of the water, against which the waves are breaking. We even perceive in the distance vast marshy lowlands. This is because, at the command of the Creator, the bottom of the sea has lifted itself up, and continents have appeared. And these new-born lands array themselves, as we look at them, with a covering of green and fresh verdure. Mosses, marsh-plants, reeds, ferns, forests of pines, and palm-trees make their appearance. These reeds, as tall as our oaks, these ferns, as large as our horse-chestnuts, wave upon the banks of rivers of dark waters, and of lakes still and shallow. Here, then, we have before our eyes, in all its luxuriant wealth, that mighty tropical vegetation, which God has preserved to our times under the form of coal.

At the bottom of these waters, life begins to stir; coral insects are building; innumerable molluscs crawl in the mud upon these low shores. But the prominent feature in the picture is that wonderful vegetation which we have just described; all the rest is as nothing compared to that unparalleled apparition. But in the forests there still reigns the silence of death; no living creature animates them by his presence. No movement is to be seen but that of the long branches swaying in the wind, and of the thick mists creeping along the marshy lands. Such was the third day, the sample of millions of other days.

And while darkness again descends upon us, something extraordinary in the state of the atmosphere announces some new and decisive step about to be made in the divine work.

The voice of the Lord proclaims:—

“LET THERE BE LIGHTS IN THE FIRMAMENT OF THE HEAVEN.”

It is night; our attention is directed towards the heavens. The canopy of clouds breaks, and in the intervals made by these rents, our sight reaches for the first time into impenetrable depths. New and unparalleled spectacle! The stars shine out in the firmament. As the sky disengages itself from the vapours which concealed it, these stars multiply. Soon their light gleams on all sides. The vault of heaven is unveiled in its completeness, shining without cloud over our heads. The morning-star beams, radiant as a queen in the midst of her court, and casts her pure image for the first time upon our globe. But soon she begins to pale. The vapours, scattered in light masses over the horizon, begin to glow; they pass from grey to bronze, from bronze to gold; the gold changes into fire; . . . one brilliant point appears above the waters; the Sun is come, and has celebrated his first rising. Darting into the azure sky, he enters boldly upon his course. The waters, ruffled by the morning breeze, glitter beneath his splendours. Under the influence of his brilliant rays, a new kind of vegetation makes its appearance, adorned with a thousand colours unknown to the preceding flora. A carpet of verdure, thicker and more varied, covers the dark soil of the continents. Soon we perceive the heavenly luminary descend towards the western horizon in a glory even more magnificent than that which surrounded his rising; and for the first time, at the opposite point of the horizon, appears the second luminary of the terrestrial creation. Rising silently into the azure vault, the moon sheds her gentle light over land and sea. Such was the fourth day, an image of millions of other days. Why were the angels alone to witness it?—But through the eyes of the Seer, we, too, have been just contemplating something of its sublime beauties.

For the fifth time, night covers the picture. But the voice has again proclaimed:—

“LET THE WATERS BRING FORTH ABUNDANTLY THE MOVING CREATURE THAT HATH LIFE, AND FOWL THAT MAY FLY ABOVE THE EARTH IN THE OPEN FIRMAMENT OF HEAVEN.”

Daylight appears. Like a bride prepared for her bridegroom, the earth is adorned with flowers of varied colours. But what do I hear? For the first time a voice other than that of the Lord God, and than the sound of the mighty waters strikes upon my ear. It is as the cry of discordant voices. Birds in close ranks, like insects on a summer evening, fly above the lakes, or traverse the forests, while others of their kind, of gigantic size, as if mounted on stilts, wade through the reedy ponds, pursuing the fish.

But they themselves soon become the prey of formidable enemies. For this is also the age of the amphibious reptiles, whether swimming or flying; monsters covered with thick scales, armed with murderous teeth, haunt the long-winding rivers, or crawl upon the wet meadows, or hang suspended on the trees and rocks ready to pounce upon their prey. The ocean also is full of life. There disport themselves the giants of the age; they stir its depths with the strokes of their mighty fins, and lift above its surface their enormous forms and terrible heads. The water, the air, the land (still marshy), all are crowded with animal life. For has not the Eternal One said: "Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven?" At this word of command all these new and unknown creatures have come into being!—And now upon this scene, full of light and movement, the sun sets, and night veils from sight the mystery of these innumerable lives. The fifth day is over, and in this single picture we have before our eyes the spectacle of millions of days, whose light did actually shine upon our globe.

Again we are plunged into Night. For the sixth time the voice proclaims:—

"LET THE EARTH BRING FORTH THE LIVING CREATURE AFTER HIS KIND."

And when the light again illumines this stage upon which the work of God was by degrees accomplishing itself, what a scene meets our eyes! The marine monsters have disappeared. Of all these horrible amphibious creatures there remains only a small number of species, less colossal, and less formidable. In their place, over the verdant plains, cattle and beasts of the field are grazing; great herds of mastodons and mammoths seek their pasture in the fresh herb-age of the forest. Ranging the woods are troops of stags and elks; the bear watches over her young in the cave; the hippopotamus crouches among the reeds, or plunges majestically into the river; the rhinoceros sports in the marshes, while the lion, the leopard, and other wild animals, lie in wait amongst the dark thickets, ready to spring upon the herds of antelopes hurrying to the water. At last, at the hour when the sun sinks, and the day declines, a supreme last word is heard:—

“LET US MAKE MAN IN OUR IMAGE.”

And the responsible lord of this creation, Man, formed in the actual image of God, comes forth at the command of his Creator upon this scene which has been arranged, adorned, and peopled to receive him.

At this moment the work of Creation ceases. The rest of God begins; but in this rest is included a new kind of work—that of the moral education of man, of his redemption and final glorification. The work of this seventh day still continues; a day sanctified by God above all the rest, but profaned by man, as none of those that preceded it was, or could be, by the creatures whose existence they illumined. A day of which we have now perhaps reached the eleventh hour, and which will be followed for some by a day without an evening, for others by a night which shall have no morning. In this Divine Sabbath which we are contemplating in the company of the man of God upon the mount, we see also the sample of millions of other days—of all those in which we ourselves are living, of all the millions of Sabbaths of which God makes use in our time for the sanctification of the human race, and which the human race so often misuses to the dishonour of the Creator.

IV.

CONCLUSION.

Let us now sum up and conclude.

Moses had said, contrary to all probability, that light had existed long before the appearance of the sun; Science has proved that the world may, and must, have been illumined, long before the appearance of the sun.

Moses had said, no less paradoxically, that the world of vegetation had appeared before the sun had shone; Science has proved that a rich life of vegetation spread over the earth before the direct intervention of the sun's rays.

Moses had spoken of three principal appearances of organic life, one vegetable, two animal; the Science of our day discerns three great epochs of organic life—that of the carboniferous age, and those of the great amphibious creatures and mammals.

Moses had represented man as the latest-born of the creation; Science declares that man is the one, of all the inhabitants of the earth, who closed the series of new creations upon our globe.

But let us admit that all these coincidences of detail are only accidental, or that they are about to be overturned by some new step in advance, either in exegesis or in geology; there still remain three principal features in the Mosaic picture which will ever claim attention from all thoughtful men:—

1. The cause of all things: God.
2. The order of things: a continual progress.
3. The final object of things: man.

1. “And God said!” This is the word which gives the key-note to the narrative, the burden ten times repeated, of this magnificent poem. To say is both to think and to will. In this speaking of God, there is both the legislative power of His intelligence, and the executive power of His will; this one word dispels all notion of blind matter, and of brute fatalism; it reveals an enlightened Power, an intelligent and benevolent Thought, underlying all that is.

And at the same time that this word, “And God said,” appears to us as the veritable truth of things, it also reveals to us their true value and legitimate use. Beautiful and beneficent as the work may be, its real worth is not in itself; it is in the thought and in the heart of the Author to whom it owes its existence. Whenever we stop short in the work itself, our enjoyment of it can only be superficial, and we are, through our ingratitude, on the road to an idolatry more or less gross. Our enjoyment is only pure and perfect when it results from the contact of our soul with the Author Himself. To form this bond is the true aim of Nature, as well as the proper destination of the life of man.

Behind this veil of the visible universe which dazzles me, behind these blind forces of which the play at times terror-strikes me, behind this regularity of seasons and this fixedness of laws, which almost compel me to recognise in all things only the march of a fixed Fate, this word, "And God said," unveils to me an Arm of might, an Eye which sees, a Heart full of benevolence which is seeking me, a Person Who loves me. This ray of light which, as it strikes upon my retina, paints there with a perfect accuracy, upon a surface of the size of a centime, a landscape of many miles in extent—He it is Who commanded it to shine. This atmosphere which my lungs breathe, and which is formed of two gases, either of which, by itself, would be a deadly poison to me—He it is Who commanded it to give me life. This ground upon which I walk, labour, build, plant, and under which, at a very small depth, the terrible central furnace is boiling—He it is Who makes it firm beneath my feet. These flowers and fruits which I gather in succession during the greatest part of the year, which delight me with their perfume, charm me with their taste, or heal me with their juices—He it is Who sowed their seeds for me in this fair garden of the earth. This sun which measures out for me my years, my days, and my hours; this moon which divides my years into months, and my months into weeks—His finger it is which causes them to move through the vault of the sky like the two hands on the dial of a watch. These various creatures which fill with life the waters, the air, and the land, and these domestic animals which make company for me even in my home—He it is Who has surrounded me with them, whether to stimulate my activity by their resistance and manifold antagonisms, or to redouble it by their docile and powerful co-operation. And if, finally, I myself am here as the master-work of this creation, able to stand apart from it in thought, to rend asunder, by adoration, this chequered veil which surrounds me on all sides, and to penetrate to the heart which beats for me in a sphere at once inexpressibly exalted above me, and inexpressibly near to me; if I can greet with the title of Father, Him Who counts the 140,000 hairs of my head as well as the myriads of stars which run their course in the firmament—it is because He has designed to make me in His own image, and to set within me a ray of His own Spirit.

God has said! In these words is, for my heart as well as for my intellect, the true worth of everything, —of my own existence.

2. The second principal feature in the Mosaic record is the homage rendered to the great law of progress. It was towards the end of the middle ages that men first began to enquire into the meaning of those marine shells which they discovered upon the high grounds of the earth. Men of science started many different hypotheses on that subject. Some said they were freaks of Nature (lusus naturæ); some saw in them reflections of the stars; some, vestiges of the deluge; others, imperfect efforts of the creative power. The idea of a creation which, having preceded man, had advanced by degrees from stage to stage, up to the crown of the whole work, did not occur to any one. And yet, there it was, laid up three thousand years back, in the Mosaic record!

And if this law of progress, already revealed by Moses, reigned with sovereign power over all the developments of that unconscious existence which we call Nature, how should it not continue to control the progress, moral and spiritual, of history? Why should not a new series of "And God said" succeed the series to which Moses listened in his vision, and which was the spring and source of the work of the Creation? And if man does not actually perceive this by his senses, do not facts bear clear testimony to this succession of Divine commands? It is true that the creative Will has to deal in history with a new and often invincible power, that of free-will—that precious spring which it will not break, but win over and make use of. None the less surely is the end attained through long circuitous ways; and in this so different medium, progress manifests itself as well as in the midst of Nature.

3. The final term of this progress in Nature, according to Moses, is man. Man, in fact, is not an individual one amongst the terrestrial creatures; he is the very object and aim of creation itself. Now how should not a being so magnificently privileged continue to be the object of the solicitude and active care of the Creator? How should not this new series of "God said," which originates the ever-ascending movement of history, refer itself also to him?

And here a grand prospect opens before us. According to the subsequent revelations recorded in Scripture, the creative Word of which Moses speaks is not only a spoken word but a speaking Word, Who was pleased to create for Himself an organ of speech, just such as He Himself was to God. The universe is His drama, performed for the glory of the Father; and in this drama man is the chief actor. He Himself has intervened to unite Himself with man, to gain him over to His cause, and make him a fellow-labourer in His Divine work. Man, by uniting his will with that of this Word, and by making his powers agents of the creative Will, becomes, instead of a creature, himself a creator. He shews himself already such, even here below, through the magic of the arts, but that is but the prelude to the new labours to which the Future will call him. And as the prophecy of Caiaphas realised itself in the Son of man^f, so will the word of the tempter, with regard to mankind, become a reality: "Ye shall be as gods."

God said: "Let there be light." And there was light.

God said: "Let us make man in our image." And man was created.

God said: "Let eternal truth shine out in the person of man^g." And Jesus appeared.

God will say: "Behold, I make all things new^h." And God shall be ALL IN ALLⁱ.

Such an end is the only one which could correspond to such a beginning, as this beginning is alone worthy of such an end.

^f S. John xi. 50.

^g Rev. xxi. 5.

^h 2 Cor. iv. 6.

ⁱ 1 Cor. xv. 28.

THE FOUR GREATER PROPHETS

MOSES had spoken of God not only as the Supreme Being, but as the Absolute Being, and consequently of His perfect Will as the law which was in the end to overcome all the self-will, and all the resistance of the creature. It is on this holy certainty that the prophetic spirit in Israel rests. "Thou shalt do," and "Thou shalt not do," are commands, but they are at the same time promises.

All nations have had their oracles or their diviners, but Israel alone has had prophets. Between divination and prophecy there are two principal distinctions. First, divination relates to the present time, but prophecy reaches forward to the very end of History, even to the latter days, according to the expression used by the Hebrew prophets. Every Jewish prophet, with the standard of the Law in his hand, estimates and judges the present in the light of that end which was to realise the Law, and in the same way presents to us the end in the light of and, in some sort, from the particular point of view of, the present time. Hence the moral bond which binds together all prophecies into a great unity. The heathen oracles are nothing but a series of declarations, isolated one from another, like the words which follow each other, without any logical connection, in the columns of a vocabulary.

The Jewish prophecies all converging towards one common end, the triumph of the holy Will of Jehovah, are linked together and complement each other, like the terms of one and the same proposition.

From this primary difference there results a second. The oracles only refer to circumstances of private or national life. Jewish prophecy reveals from its very first word its bearing upon mankind as a whole: "the seed of the woman" (this expression, in the original, properly signifies the whole of humanity,) "shall bruise the serpent's head." Later on, it is true, at the time of the call of Abraham, the prophetic horizon seems to narrow itself; prophecy nationalises itself, so to say. But it is then, precisely, that it takes pains to affirm and expressly to declare its universal tendency: "in thy seed," says the voice of God to Abraham, "shall all the families of the earth be blessed." The seed of Abraham, (that is, as is signified in the original, the people of Israel,) is only the means to an end; the end itself was, "all the families of the earth." And when, at last, prophecy limits itself to a sphere still more confined, and concentrates itself upon one single individual, that wonderful Person, in Whom all preceding promises were to find their fulfilment, the Messiah, this is the language in which he is spoken of: "I have given thee the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Rome saw in foreign nations only material for her triumph; but Israel, from the very beginning, looked upon itself as the agent for the salvation of the world, as the predestined instrument for the welfare of the nations. This marvellous fact deserves more serious attention from the philosophy of history than it has yet received; all the more so, because this is not an isolated feature, but is connected with a more general truth. Whilst we see all other nations marching forward with gaze fixed upon the earth, and absorbed only in thoughts of their own power and temporal prosperity, Israel is seen, in history, advancing with hands ever outstretched towards a future good, distinctly contemplated, and the hope of which it boldly makes the very principle and support of its existence. The Gentiles are the peoples of the present, the nations of the earth, as our Lord expresses it; Israel never ceases, even in the midst of its calamities, to feel itself the nation of the future.

It was prophecy which, more than all else, helped to keep alive in the Jewish people this wonderful aspiration which no national disaster could extinguish. As a living application of the Divine law — of its promises and threats — to the present, and as a picture, at once austere and brilliant, of the final triumph of this law, prophecy was, through all ages, to Israel, as it were the bridge between its present and its future. Accordingly, at no epoch of importance did the grand voice of prophecy fail the chosen people. At the time of the foundation of the monarchy, David and his singers announced in hymns, which we still possess, the propagation over the whole earth of the knowledge of Jehovah. One or two centuries later, at that critical moment when the little Israelitish state found itself in contact with the huge monarchies which bordered upon it to the south and east, a whole group of prophets, Joel, Amos, Micah, Isaiah, illumined its onward path beset with rocks. Two centuries later, when the kingdom of Judah fell beneath the blows of the victorious Chaldean, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah supported it under this terrible catastrophe. During the captivity, Ezekiel and Daniel prepared the way for the return. And when at last the unhopèd-for restoration was accomplished, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi received the mission to preside over this re-establishment.

After Malachi, the chain of prophecy is broken for a time. During the four centuries which follow, Israel acknowledges itself destitute of the breath of prophecy*. But in the person of John the Baptist, the mysterious chain is re-knit, and he appears who was at once the last of the prophets, and more than a prophet. Then comes the decisive moment when the spirit of prophecy withdraws from Israel, and passes into Jesus, and through the Apostles into the new people of God.

It is of the four chief among these extraordinary men, sent to the chosen people, that we are now about to treat. I do not propose either to trace their history in detail, or to embark in the critical study of the writings which Jewish tradition attributes to them. My wish is only to mark the relation which exists between the dominant thought of their ministry, as it stands out generally in the books which bear their names, and the moral position of their nation in the age in which they lived.

* See the books of the Maccabees, where this sentiment is repeatedly expressed.

These men of God, while tracing for their own times the great lines of the Divine plan, have determined for ever the normal direction of human thought. The carrying out of this same plan, sketched by them in broad lines, is bearing us onward even in this our day. Hence we have still something to learn from them. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, are for us not only prophets; they are and will continue to be our prophets.

ISAIAH.

The title which forms the preamble of the book of this prophet places his ministry under four kings; Josiah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah. According to the Jewish tradition, he lived even into the reign of the son of this last, Manasseh. He is said to have perished sawn asunder, in the trunk of a tree in which he had taken refuge, by the hand of the executioners sent by the king to take him. His ministry must have lasted nearly sixty years.

It has been asserted that Isaiah was descended from the royal race. This legend is probably only a way of expressing by the help of a symbol the kingly majesty of his thought and style.

Isaiah lived at a nearly equal distance of time from the foundation of the monarchy under Saul and David (eleven centuries B.C.), and its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar (five or six centuries B.C.) This was a critical epoch, a decisive moment in the history of the nation. Until then, notwithstanding some vexatious events, such as the separation of the ten tribes, and an Egyptian invasion under Rehoboam, the little theocratic kingdom had held its ground admirably. It had preserved its independence, and had maintained its prosperity almost at the level to which its first sovereigns had raised it. Seated upon her mountains, Jerusalem reigned proudly over the territories of Judah and Benjamin. The temple was always the focus of life, the heart of the nation.

But at this time a serious question was suggesting itself: was this state of prosperity—the result of the spiritual awakening due to the labours of Samuel and David—to continue, or was it coming to an end? Two enemies were threatening it; one internal—the dissolution of morals which this long-continued prosperity began to engender. Beneath the regularity of worship and the pomp of ceremonies lay concealed, ever more and more, alienation from God, and hearts without devotion. Under apparent invocation of the Name of Jehovah there was, ever growing, the love of luxury, and of the riches and pleasures of the world. A practised ear, such as that of Isaiah, could hear resounding out of heaven this sentence: “This people honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me." The moral level of the nation was sinking instead of rising. The other enemy threatened from without—the Assyrian power which was growing up in the East. Like some devastating torrent, it already made itself heard on the other side of the desert, in low mutterings. Placed between this growing power and the ancient Egyptian monarchy, the little state of Judah might either be tempted to throw itself into the arms of the latter, to escape from Assyria, or to lean upon Assyria—that is, to make of it ere long a master—in order to ward off the blows with which Egypt constantly threatened it; two policies between which human prudence might well hesitate, but which faith in Jehovah, the Head and Protector of the theocracy, condemned equally. Strict neutrality between its powerful neighbours was for Judah at once the line of conduct prescribed by fidelity to God, and the surest guarantee of its own independence.

There are, in the life of every individual man and of every nation, a small number of tragic moments, which are decisive of their future for a long time. The age of Isaiah was for Israel the most solemn of these times. A precipice opened before it, down which it already began to be drawn. This was the moment for the nation either to regain its footing on the tableland at the top, or to give itself up to the power which was beginning to take possession of it. If it chose the latter alternative, energetic action was needless; it had but to let itself go. In that case, inaction was really action. But if, on the contrary, it chose the former course, it must enter upon intelligent, voluntary, energetic action, and adopt a decided line. But to bring it to that, a strong moral movement was needed. To labour to effect this was the mission of Isaiah.

He has himself, in chap. vi. of his prophecies, drawn the picture of his first meeting with Jehovah—of the vision in which he received his mission. We find already fully revealed, in this interview between the Eternal and His prophet, the three great ideas which were the sustaining powers of his ministry of sixty years. The first: God is holy, therefore His people Israel must be holy. Holiness is to be the unchangeable law of their national existence: “Holy, holy, holy,” cry one to another, with subdued voice, the seraphim standing before the throne. And the sanctuary is shaken. Isaiah catches a sudden glimpse, terrible in its clearness, of his own and his people’s sin; he feels himself, as it were, struck dead at the sight. Hence the second thought: the nation is already too far gone in sin to be able to accept in earnest the appeals for reform addressed to them by the prophet on behalf of God. “They hear indeed, but do not understand.” In order to purify this people, whom God has already ceased to call My people, words are not sufficient; there must be a great national chastisement. “Lord, how long?” asks the prophet. “Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate," is the Lord's answer. But is that to be the end of the prophetic vision? No; and here is the third thought: as the metal comes forth from the crucible, reduced in size but purified, so, after the judgment which shall fall twice upon the people, there shall remain a holy remnant, the germ of the true people of God. "In it shall be a tenth, and it shall return and shall be eaten; as a teil tree, and as an oak whose substance is in them when they cast their leaves, so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof."

Thus, holiness as the law, chastisement as the means, and the holy remnant as the result; these are the three fundamental thoughts of this Divine dialogue, the foundation of the whole ministry of Isaiah. They sum up, if I may so say, the whole religious philosophy of the prophet; a philosophy evidently superior to mere human wisdom, and descending from that same Sinai, whence came forth the Law.

Under the head of the first of these three principles, there was unveiled to Isaiah the glorious vision of the royal Advent of the Messiah, and of His reign of holiness and of peace.

"For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. . . ."

"And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots: and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord; and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord: and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears: but with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek: and his rest shall be glorious^b."

These visions could not be directly reached by the people of Judah except by the normal road of national sanctification. But the moral state of the nation does not allow the expectation of such a fulfilment of prophecy as would be the reward of faithfulness. Two vices render Judah incapable of answering, in its present state, to the purposes of God: one, that merely external devotion which it makes its pillow of security; the other, the tendency to idolatry and to all the vices connected with it. This mass, formed of such heterogeneous elements, must, therefore, undergo a severe winnowing; "Sion shall be redeemed with judgment^c." This necessity is not an arbitrary fate—it is altogether moral. Israel alone is responsible for it. It was free to escape. But Isaiah reads the contrary, written plain both on the present and the future. He unfolds his views on this subject in a particular case, when, addressing Hezekiah who had complacently spread forth his treasures before the ambassadors of the king of Babylon, he says, "Behold, the days come that all that is in thine house . . . shall be carried to Babylon^d." The folly of Hezekiah is only a sample of the still grosser folly of the people. The Divine decree of exile rests upon the perception of the folly of Israel, and upon the knowledge of its consequences.

^b Isa. ix. 6; xi. 1—10,

But answering to this necessity for punishment—the result of the sin of man—there is another necessity—the fruit of the pure and free grace of God.

Has it ever happened to you, on a beautiful autumn day, to sit down on some landing-place of one of our Jurassic mountains, at the edge of the incline which descends almost perpendicularly into the plain below? The bottom of the immense space spread out under your feet was covered with a thick fog, which, like a cold winding-sheet, concealed from your eyes the lakes, fields, and villages. For some time your eyes fell sadly upon this misty abyss. Then suddenly they rose, as if instinctively, to seek some other object; and what was the sight now revealed to them? It was those silvered summits, terraced majestically in two or three stages one above another, which form the southern wall of our country, shining brightly above the sea of fog which enveloped the plain, like a heavenly apparition. And you could not take your eyes off this glorious picture, which no artist's pencil could reproduce.

^c Isa. i. 27.

^d Isa. xxxix. 6.

At the time when Isaiah prophesied, the immediate future of Israel lay dark before him. The moral decay was beginning. The eye of the prophet scanned with terror the rapidity of the descent, the violence and depth of the inevitable fall. But beyond and above this abyss of sin and of chastisement, there shone out before his prophetic gaze a most glorious future, a double salvation.

First, a temporary deliverance—the national restoration after the purifying judgment of the Captivity; secondly—higher and more distant—the true, the eternal salvation, the reconciliation of Israel and of mankind with Heaven, the establishment of the kingdom of God upon the whole earth, by means of the holy remnant which was to emerge from the crucible of chastisement.

As agents of these two deliverances, Isaiah sees before him two persons. One is to be a pagan king; for, once sent into exile, Israel has no longer a national king. This foreign king God calls His anointed, like the Messiah Himself. He is to be a kind of Messiah, raised up to do a temporary work, from the midst of the Gentiles. His name is to be Cyrus, Coreseh from Kurusch, a Persian word which means sun, and which was perhaps at this time a dynastic title, like the name of Pharaoh.

"Thus saith the Lord: Cyrus is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid. Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus. . . . For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called Thee. . . ."

Everyone knows that Jerusalem and the temple were rebuilt in consequence of an edict issued by the young Persian conqueror, Aggradatus, surnamed Cyrus, in the year 536 B.C.

But this political restoration is only to be the first stage of the redemption. Isaiah contemplates the advent of another Person, Who is to complete the work thus begun; it is that of the servant of Jehovah. In one sense, the whole nation of Israel already bears this title; the prophets bear it in a more special sense. But this messenger alone realises it in perfection. This is the Messiah Himself, charged with the complete fulfilment here below of the Divine decree. But—here is a notable fact—Isaiah no longer sees Him as at the beginning, girded with power, crowned with glory, seated on the throne of His father David. Not, indeed, that these hopes are withdrawn; the day will come when they also shall be realised. But at the moment Isaiah beholds Him charged with another task, which is the preliminary condition of His royal dignity. As Israel must for its sins pass through the judgment of the Captivity, as the whole world is under the weight of a universal condemnation, so must a judgment reach the Servant of Jehovah. His condemnation alone shall definitively take away that of Israel and of the whole human race. It is now as a victim that Isaiah sees the Messiah make His appearance. Before He becomes the Prince of Peace, as he had before beheld Him, He is to be the Man of sorrows.

• Isa. xlv. 28; xlv. 1, 4.

“Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground: he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth. . . . Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief: when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand. He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied: by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities. Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors^f.”

We are aware how many things are in our day denied, but we cannot conceive how, in presence of this picture, drawn seven centuries B.C., any one will deny the reality of the inspiration of prophecy g.

But this Messiah, steeped in humiliations, is not one who answers to the disappointed aspirations of the bulk of the people. “Who hath believed our report?” says the prophet himself as he introduces this picture. Isaiah himself hears this faithful Servant of God, crying out in his nights of watching and prayer, “I have laboured in vain, I have spent

^f Isa. liii.

^g All the rationalistic subterfuges by which this description is applied to the Jewish nation suffering for the heathen, or to the company of the prophets suffering for the nation, are overthrown by this single word the Man of sorrows, which can only be applied to a person. M. Renan, from whom we have borrowed a part of this translation, evidently feels this. Accordingly, he applies this passage to some one of those unknown righteous men whose blood crimsoned the streets of Jerusalem at the taking of that city. Read and judge. The sin of the world expiated, the designs of God accomplished, eternal intercession made by—some righteous man put to death by Nebuchadnezzar! This interpretation is the note of despair.

my strength for nought and in vain^h." But the answer of the Eternal is magnificent: "It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation *unto the end of the earth*ⁱ."

These are some specimens of the manner in which Isaiah developes and applies the three great ideas in which his prophecy is summed up: a destiny of holiness imposed upon Israel as the people of Jehovah; holy judgments always hanging over them, if they do not conform to this destination which is the law of their existence; and a holy and imperishable remnant, purified by repeated judgments, by means of which will be realised that glorious state of things which is to shine forth in the latter days.

Could these intuitions, and their various applications in the prophecy, be only emanations of the Jewish consciousness, or previsions of human reason? The future transportation of the nation to Babylon; its restoration—a fact unparalleled in all history; the appearance of a Messiah, covered at first with opprobrium, and then, pursuing still His course, crowned with honour; the rejection of this Messiah by Israel itself—the people prepared to receive Him; finally, the setting up of the Kingdom of God among the Gentiles through faith in that Christ from Whom Israel had turned away in scorn,—could these be ideas inspired by the spirit of that nation, or simple natural presentiments? If the Providence that governs history did not mark these ideas with a stamp of Divinity, their contents alone would suffice to reveal their source. Such a breath of holiness does not spring from the heart of man.

^h Isa. xlix. 4.

ⁱ ver. 6.

The name which Isaiah delights to give to God in his book is the Holy One of Israel. This Name is the summing up, as one may see, of the whole of his prophecy. It brings to light also, in a striking manner, the relation between his ministry and the era the peculiar needs of which it was his mission to answer.

JEREMIAH.

In the time of Isaiah two courses were open for Israel. Either to let itself go down the steep descent which opened under its feet, or to strengthen its hold upon the table-land above. A century and a half later, in the time of Jeremiah, this alternative was no longer open. Israel had already descended far down the fatal slope, and was on the point of falling over the precipice. The people were giving themselves up to idolatry with an ardour akin to madness. Never has this strange worship better deserved the name of "possession on a great scale" which has been bestowed upon it with so much reason. All the divinities of the East, Baal, Astarte, Moloch, Thammuz, seem to have agreed to meet in Jeru-saalem; the temple had become a pantheon. The three last kings were among the very worst that the little state ever had. Under Jehoiakim, the Chaldean conqueror, Nebuchadnezzar, appears for the first time in the Holy Land, and Judah becomes tributary to him. A little later, Jehoiachin, his successor, is himself taken captive with the best part of his people. Finally, under Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar strikes the last blow; Jerusalem is destroyed, together with the temple.

Such are the circumstances in the midst of which Jeremiah was called to exercise the prophetic ministry. Never was heavier burden laid upon the shoulders of mortal man. A man of tender, loving, yielding, deeply-impressible spirit, Jeremiah intensely loved his country. He would have given all he had to see Judah flourishing, Jerusalem prosperous; and, lo, we see him compelled by his destiny to announce to his fellow-citizens nothing but misfortune. His office was like that of the minister obliged to accompany a criminal to the scaffold. He induces Israel and its king to submit to the decree of the Divine justice. He depicts the uselessness, danger, and sin of resistance. At the sound of these strange words, his hearers spring upon him with indignation and rage; they accuse him of connivance with the enemies of his country. King Jehoiakim tears up the collection of his first discourses, and throws the shreds into the fire.

The fiery patriots seize the prophet, and throw him to the bottom of a well without water. He passes whole days and nights in this horrible prison. But what are his physical sufferings compared with the moral torment he endures in seeing himself treated as the enemy of his country—he who lives and suffers only for love of her? Can one be surprised, if now and then sinking under the burden, he is tempted, like Job, to curse the day of his birth?

But these are only transitory moments of weakness. Soon faith regains the ascendant, and with the same courage with which he had dared to preach to his people submission to the foreign conqueror, he now endeavours to animate them once more with hope, and boldly proclaims the deliverance that shall come. One day, while the Chaldean army still holds Jerusalem in siege, Jeremiah buys, by a legal act, for himself and his descendants, the field on which the army of the Chaldeans is encamped, thus giving to Israel, at the very moment when he announced its coming destruction, a public pledge of his belief in its future restoration. Another time he announces that after seventy years, when Israel shall have expiated all the Sabbaths and all the Sabbatical years they had profaned, this people shall return from the strange land and re-enter the land of their fathers. Nay more, he sees the justice of God, now so merciless to them and under whose blows he had counselled them to bow down, ready soon to rise up in favour of the guilty but repentant nation and to pronounce its absolution. And in the strength of this courageous faith, he is not afraid to give to the Messiah that name which defies all present misfortunes: the Lord our Righteousness.

This is because, upon the ruins of the old covenant, henceforth broken through the faithlessness of Israel, Jeremiah sees another arising, founded upon a higher contract, more excellent both in its nature and its duration than that of Sinai. Here is the culminating point, not only of the prophecy of Jeremiah, but of that of the whole Old Testament; the marvellous prediction of the abolition of that very covenant to which the prophecy itself belongs, and of the coming in of a totally different order of things, resting upon a new basis:—

“Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord: but this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts and they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more^k.”

We do not think History contains another instance of a religion which, while claiming to be Divine, yet proclaims its own insufficiency, and announces a new one which will bestow upon humanity more excellent gifts. This is that miracle of self-abnegation which is repeated later on in time, in the personal relation of John the Baptist to Jesus Christ.

^k Jer. xxxi. 31—34.

The renewing of hearts by the Holy Spirit—that renewal which is the fruit of the forgiveness of sins and the spring of an obedience free and filial, which the Law never had the power to produce—this is the basis of the new covenant, announced by Jeremiah, which should one day be established between Jehovah and mankind. These foundations, so distinctly indicated six centuries beforehand, were really laid in the two days, Good-Friday and Pentecost; they are these—reconciliation through the Blood of the Lamb, and renewal of the heart by the Holy Spirit. Here we discover in the prophet an intuition, the purest and most spiritual, of the kingdom of God upon earth. Here we see the noble hopes with which God sustained him and the whole nation, at the moment when they were witnessing the downfall of the visible theocracy.

Accordingly, when, after a long siege, the enemy effected an entrance into Jerusalem, Jeremiah was able to contemplate with resignation the destruction of the city which he loved, the burning of the temple in which he had so often officiated as a priest. The conqueror treated him with respect; he gave him the choice of either accompanying him to Babylon, or remaining in the land of his fathers. Jeremiah had no hesitation in preferring his own desolated country to the splendour of the foreign capital. It was at this time, no doubt, that he composed those fine elegies which are collected in the Book of Lamentations. Then, faithful to the last to his thankless mission, he followed without delay the remainder of his people into Egypt, whither, after the assassination of the Chaldean governor, the remnant of the Israelites fled for shelter from the vengeance which they feared. According to Jewish tradition, Jeremiah perished in Egypt, a victim to the hatred drawn down upon him by the warnings which he was never weary of uttering to these senseless people.

Succeeding ages have done justice to Jeremiah. The more his contemporaries humiliated and ill-treated him, the more has posterity exalted and glorified him, to such a degree that in the time of Jesus, as we see in the New Testament, he was known by the name simply of the prophet. And this was but right. If the picture which he has drawn of the new covenant is the culminating point of prophecy, is not his own personal fate the most complete type of that of the Messiah? Is not his conflict with the excited patriots and false prophets of his time, the prelude to that of Jesus with those Pharisees and zealots who over-excited the carnal hopes of Israel, and were preparing for them the most terrible of delusions? Jeremiah is certainly, more than any other before John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Man of Sorrows.

God as the Righteous One,—that is the dominant idea of his ministry. To bow beneath the Hand of God when He chastises, and then to wait upon Him as alone having power to absolve the nation on their repentance—this, indeed, was the very message which Israel needed at the time when Jeremiah was given to them as their counsellor and their guide. We have just seen with what unconquerable fidelity this naturally gentle and tender heart succeeded in fulfilling this office; God, when He called him, had “touched his mouth with His hand¹.”

EZEKIEL.

Although younger than Jeremiah, Ezekiel was for some time his contemporary. Whilst the one was prophesying in Jerusalem, the other was fulfilling his ministry in Babylonia. Several years before the ruin of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar had carried captive to the East the élite of the Jewish people, and particularly many young men belonging to the best Jewish families. These were the first-fruits of the approaching harvest. Among these young exiles was Ezekiel. He was sent, with the company of captives to which he belonged, into Mesopotamia on the banks of the Chebar, a tributary of the Euphrates. The place in which he was settled—or as we should now say ‘interné’—was called Tel-Abib, which means the “hill of corn.” This name indicates the fertility of the country. Looking from the point of view of material prosperity, there seemed to be nothing wanting to this colony. The elders used to meet together in the house of the young prophet; for public preaching, such as was practised in Jerusalem, was not possible in a foreign land. Ezekiel communicated to them the revelations of the Eternal; and they transmitted them to the people around.

¹ Jer. i. 9.

Jerusalem was still standing. The fate of their menaced country engrossed the thoughts of the exiles. Their state of mind was one of profound discouragement. The prospect of the great national judgment for which Jeremiah had prepared them, was not yet accepted by them. Until their submission was complete, moral improvement was impossible. Ezekiel was therefore obliged to begin by completing the work of Jeremiah in bringing the exiles to ratify in their own conscience the judgment now about to fall upon their country. This was the object of the first part of his ministry.

God transports him in spirit to the land of mountains,—so does the beloved home of his childhood and youth present itself to his memory, in the midst of the vast plains over which his eye now wanders. He imagines himself present at the idolatrous abominations, of which Jerusalem, and even the temple itself, is the scene. He contemplates, in a vision, the Israelitish women celebrating, in the sanctuary, the feast of the Phenician god Thammuz, the Adonis of the Greeks. In the inner court, the high-priest, at the head of the chiefs of the twenty-four classes of sacrificers, is worshipping the sun. Then, following upon these profanations, he beholds the mysterious cloud, symbol of the Presence of God, rising from over the Holy of Holies, and moving off to the threshold of the temple. Thence it once more rises, and now takes up its position upon the Mount of Olives, to the east of the city,—thus abandoning Jerusalem and the temple into the hands of the enemy, in order to shelter that portion only of the nation which had been carried away to the East, and which was thenceforth to be the sole hope of the kingdom of God upon earth. Wondrous picture, fitted to make the exiles accept the approaching destruction of the city and of the temple, and at the same time to kindle in them faith in their future restoration!

One morning, however, Ezekiel announced to the elders that his mouth would be closed until the day when one that had escaped should bring to the exiles the fatal news of the taking of Jerusalem. On the evening of that same day the wife of the prophet died suddenly. And the Lord, by forbidding Ezekiel to put on mourning for her who had been the delight of his life, made the exiles understand what their conduct should be when the news of the great national mourning should reach them. Three years went by under the burden of this suspense. At last the messenger arrived. On the same day the power of speech was restored to the prophet. Was it in order to sing a lamentation, like those which Jeremiah uttered, over the smoking ruins of the capital? No; but to reveal visions of restoration and of glory. In one of his former visions, Ezekiel had beheld a stream of fire issuing from the throne of God. That was a fitting symbol of his own preaching, which from this time poured itself into the broken hearts of the people like a river of hope.

His beloved country rises once more to his mind's eye. Now no longer a desolated land, but a country richly inhabited. Worshipped by his now restored people, the Lord gives them as their shepherd a new David.

"And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. And I the Lord will be their God, and my servant David a prince among them; I the Lord have spoken it. And I will make with them a covenant of peace, and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land: and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods. And I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in his season; there shall be showers of blessing. . . And they shall no more be a prey to the heathen, neither shall the beast of the land devour them; but they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid."^m

But this return of Israel into their own land is only the beginning of blessings. Ezekiel beholds it followed by still more precious gifts:—

"Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you: and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them *.”

^m Ezek. xxxiv. 28—28.

Nevertheless, to all these promises, temporal or spiritual, what is the response of the people around him? In the depth of despondency, they cry: All this is very grand, but impossible. Was such a sight ever seen, as that a nation which had been carried away captive into a strange land, should return to its home? Babylonia seemed to the captives like a great pit into which they were to be cast for ever, and from which no power could ever draw them out. Bitterly they cry: “Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost; we are cut off for our parts.” At the sound of these words, Ezekiel rouses himself. How is he ever to conquer this dull faithlessness? Suddenly the eye of the prophet opens: God shews him a vision, of which no catastrophe shall ever be able to efface the memory, either from the heart of Israel, or from mankind. He finds himself alone in the midst of a boundless plain, all strewn with bones, and these bones are all utterly dry. The hand of the Lord is upon the prophet, and makes him pass through this scene of desolation. Before him on every side is the absolute victory of death over life. It is like the scene of some bloody battle, which no human foot has trodden during the ages that have passed away since the day of that terrible conflict. Nature has completed her work of destruction. Every vestige of life has disappeared in these dried-up remains. At the close of this vision the Lord says to him :—

* Ezek. xxxvi. 25—27.

• Ezek. xxxvii. 11.

“Son of man, can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord God, Thou knowest. Again he said unto me, Prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord God unto these bones; Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live: and I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live; and ye shall know that I am the Lord. So I prophesied as I was commanded: and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone.”

No sooner has Ezekiel uttered the Divine command to these bones, than over the whole extent of the plain, movement succeeds to stillness, and a mysterious sound to the profound silence. These bones begin to stir—to come together; they form into skeletons; then appear the sinews—and the flesh covers the sinews, and clothes itself in skin.—But here the whole process ends. The organs of life are there, but life itself is wanting. They are no longer mere skeletons, but still they are only dead bodies,—“there is no breath in them,” says the prophet. This is but the first phase of a resurrection. But the Lord will not leave His work unfinished:—

“Then said he unto me, Prophecy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord God: Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army ^a.”

Now the resurrection is complete. What is the significance of those two actions, by means of which it is effected? God Himself explains them in the following words:—

“O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, . . . and I will put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live; then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it ^r.”

Here we have the picture of a double restoration; primarily an external and political elevation of the people, of which the former phase of the resurrection is the image; this is the return from the Captivity. But a national restoration can give to a people only the organs of life—civil and social institutions, not life itself. Now what is the most brilliant and prosperous state, without life—without the Divine breath, the spirit of holiness? It is but as a flower that soon fades away without having borne its fruit. The return of Israel into their own country, if it was truly to deserve the name of a resurrection, should culminate in the kingdom of God; but this can only be by means of a gift from heaven, that of spiritual life. In Pentecost, then, we see the second act represented in the vision, and one which, while effecting the spiritual regeneration of the nation, will also inaugurate the new era of a salvation for all mankind.

^a Ezek. xxxvii. 9, 10.

^r Ezek. xxxvii. 12, 14.

The eye of the prophet penetrates further still into the depths of the future. Each prophet has contemplated under some one particular aspect the final scene of the picture, the latter days. Ezekiel, the priest, sees this final consummation under the image of a temple of admirable purity of form. This sanctuary, which he describes in the nine last chapters of his book, is not a servile reproduction of Solomon's temple, now destroyed. It is distinguished from that by very significant differences; the ark and the mercy-seat are no longer seen in the Holy of Holies and the Holy Place; there is no golden altar in the latter; a simple table like that around which a father gathers his children, has replaced the altar of incense. But the most remarkable feature, is a stream which issues from the threshold of this new sanctuary. It is of no great depth at first; when Ezekiel crosses it in the inner court, the water only reaches to the ankles. But this mysterious stream, although receiving no tributary from without, increases visibly as it advances in its course. When Ezekiel crosses it a little lower down, the water already reaches to his knees. Further on, the water rises to his loins; and when he has passed still lower down along the river, he can no longer cross it on foot, he must swim over it. These wonderful waters seem to increase in bulk by some internal virtue of their own, and each drop possesses the strange property of becoming in its turn a spring.

The stream runs eastward, towards the low plains which extend to the north of the Dead Sea. As it crosses the barren lands to the east of Jerusalem, it transforms them into fertile orchards. Fruitful trees, like those of Eden, grow upon its banks. Arrived at the valley of the Jordan, the stream crosses it, and pours itself into the Dead Sea. It is well known that this lake, saturated with salt and asphalt, cannot give life to any fish; and that its banks, covered with white saline emanations, and intersected by black streams of asphalt running down from the neighbouring mountains, are almost entirely uninhabited. But the stream that issues from the sanctuary no sooner reaches the waters of this sea than it heals them. Soon the fish begin to live and multiply in them. Colonies of fishermen establish themselves upon its banks; and in these solitudes, the stir of industry and social life succeeds to the stillness of death.

Some have attempted to interpret these pictures literally. They have maintained that Ezekiel intended to paint the actual temple which Israel should re-build at the return from the Captivity. But how can we suppose he would have allowed himself to make such radical changes in the ordinances of the sanctuary es-established by Moses? And how could a literal river flow out of such a building? Who ever saw a stream running down from the top of a table-land, commanded by no height above it, and this stream increasing without receiving any tributary, by its own inherent force? Besides, are not the spiritual meanings of the modifications introduced into the ancient forms of the sanctuary sufficiently evident? The substitution of a simple table for the golden altar; the suppression of the veil between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies; are not these expressive emblems of that perfect communion with God, in which the faithful under the new covenant may draw near to Him without restraint, and where God receives them at His table as a father does his children? The stream of healing waters which issues from the sanctuary,—is it not an image of that ever-rising stream—the Word and the Spirit of the Lord—which, just so far as it effects an entrance into humanity, makes all things in it new, and becomes in every heart which receives it a living spring of new life? These fruit-trees, growing upon either bank of the river, do not they represent those beneficent institutions which ever mark the course of the Gospel in the midst of a believing population; and this Dead Sea, purified and healed, does it not typify the heathen world, that unclean sewer, becoming, by means of the life which flows from Christ, the scene of the noblest works of God?

One last touch completes the beauty of this picture. That cloud which Ezekiel had beheld in the beginning, withdrawing itself from the desecrated temple, he now sees making its solemn entry into this perfected sanctuary. God comes to dwell in the midst of His renovated temple. In fact, even whilst sometimes God gives up to destruction the visible institutions which have temporarily served as instruments for His work, He never abandons the work itself. He reserves to Himself the power of renewing it after each failure, under a form more spiritual and more holy. It was by means of these glorious visions that Ezekiel laboured to revive the courage of the exiles, and made them fitted—they and their descendants—to preserve for some centuries longer the ancient theocratic institution, of which the mission was not yet accomplished.

The Omnipotence of the living God,—that is the idea which predominates in the whole ministry of Ezekiel. It was that which was demanded by the condition of a people in whom the sense of their weakness was in danger of becoming an overwhelming discouragement.

DANIEL.

Daniel had been carried into captivity nearly at the same time as Ezekiel; but whilst the latter exercised his ministry in the country, the former was living in the capital, where he filled one of the highest social positions. He had been dedicated by his master, the king of Babylon, to the study of astronomy in the college of magicians, in order that he might learn the art of discovering by the movements of the stars the designs of God. After having given to Nebuchadnezzar the interpretation of a wonderful dream, he became one of the first rulers in the empire. From this exalted position, as from the top of a tower overlooking the whole country, he contemplated the course of history—of that which was then passing before his eyes, as well as of that which should happen in the future. He was already advanced in years when Cyaxares, king of Media, (called in our Scriptures Darius the Mede,) with the help of his young ally, Cyrus, king of Persia, took Babylon by assault, and overthrew the vast empire of the Chaldeans. This event was followed immediately by the famous decree which permitted the Jews to return to their own country and rebuild their temple. A solitary instance in history of such a permission! It is natural enough to suppose that Daniel, who was in high favour at the court of the new sovereign, as he had been in that of the old, had some share in bringing about this measure. But he did not associate himself personally with its realisation; and when the exiles took their journey to their own country, he only followed them with his eyes. He thought he could be of more use to his poor fellow-countrymen by remaining at the court of the Persian monarchs than by his presence at Jerusalem.

This wonderful and almost miraculous return had raised to the highest pitch the expectations of Israel. As it had been the habit of the prophets to connect in their visions the glories of the latter days with the blessings of the immediate future, they placed no interval between their picture of the return from captivity and the description of the times of the Messiah. The people, giving a chronological interpretation to this connection, imagined that the restoration of Jerusalem would immediately precede the coming of the Christ. But a larger horizon spread before the eyes of Daniel; and the aim of his ministry was to inspire into Israel a new virtue—that of calmness in expectation, of faith taking the form of perseverance.

Already, under Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel had had a vision of the unfolding of history up to the coming of the Messiah, under many grand phases,—stages in the journey of humanity in search of its lost unity. In the colossal image, “whose head was of gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass, his legs of iron, and his feet part of iron and part of clay,” he had recognised four forms of terrestrial power, hostile to God, which were to succeed each other before the coming of Christ. Then, in the little stone, cut out from the mountain without hands, which had smitten and overturned the image and taken its place, becoming a great mountain which filled the whole earth, he had discerned without difficulty the kingdom of the Messiah, feeble at its beginning, but growing through the Divine power, and taking the place of all other powers. And who could fail to see the wonderful correspondence between this prophetic picture and the general course of history? At the very moment when the last and mightiest of the heathen monarchies was swallowing up the remains of all the preceding ones, and gathering together under one rule all the nations of the world, a Child of obscure parentage was born in Bethlehem, and grew up at Nazareth. It was the power of the Spirit which was then making its appearance and becoming incarnate in a Man, soon to come into collision with the brutality of earthly power. The shock took place, and we know its effects. The image has crumbled to pieces; the little stone is uninjured and still growing. The trial, it is true, is not yet over; but the results of experience are before us, to enable us to foresee the realisation of the end described in the prophetic vision.

Thus, then, four great empires are to succeed each other from the time of Daniel to that of the Messiah, on the stage of the world. Daniel contemplates them over again in the vision related in chap. vii., under the image of the four living creatures which he beholds emerging in succession from the waters of the sea—that is, from the midst of heathendom—and which vanish to make room for the one only eternal kingdom—that of which the figure of the Son of Man is the emblem.

But what is to become of the little nation of Israel, only just restored, in the midst of these political convulsions which it must pass through before it reaches the promised salvation? During the Captivity, Daniel had been one day employed in calculating the length of the time during which the national punishment was yet to last. He knew, no doubt, that Jeremiah had fixed seventy years as the length of the duration of the exile. But the date from which to calculate was not determined; for there had been several deportations. Daniel, however, could not doubt that the end must be near; and his prayer was at that very time hastening on the desired event. Gabriel, the interpreter of the Divine mercies, appears to him and announces that the return is indeed very near, but that that event will by no means coincide, as Israel imagines, with the coming of the Messiah. God's people have still long and grievous periods to go through, before they will reach the goal so impatiently expected. The heavenly messenger, in the first place, marks out distinctly the whole of the period which is to intervene between the return from the captivity and the coming of Christ. It was to be a vast cycle of seventy weeks of years; exactly seven times as long as the Captivity had lasted; as if God wished to say to His people: "add to that long period of exile seven times its own length, and you will have an idea of the length of the interval which still separates you from the moment which you think so near."

"Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy.*"

These six expressions, of which the three first describe the complete abolition of sin, the three last the perfect realisation of righteousness on the earth, can only relate to the consummation of the Divine work,—the time of the Messiah. Seven times seventy years, that is to say 490 years, or about five centuries—such, to speak generally, is the measure of the cycle which comprehends the remainder of the history of Israel between the return from the Captivity and the kingdom of God. We know that the edict of Cyrus was issued in the year B.C. 536. There is, then, evidently an approximative coincidence between the prophetic cycle, and the historic period which answers to it. We should here remember that the figures of the prophetic periods have always a typical side, and are subject to the law of the sacred numbers. Their chronological value cannot therefore be exact.

* Daniel ix. 24.

After this first summary statement, the general cycle is subdivided into three subordinate periods. The first is reckoned at seven weeks^a, that is, forty-nine years, or very nearly half-a-century. This number stands for the period of the restoration, that is to say, the time of the rebuilding of the temple, of the holy city, and of its walls. The second sub-division is sixty-two weeks, 434 years, about four centuries and a half. This number has no special value of its own. It is merely the result of the subtraction of the numbers of the first and third subdivisions from that of the total period. It is the measure of the time of maintenance of the restored people, of that long state of almost constant warfare for Israel, during the great political convulsions which followed the national restoration. The third sub-division only includes one single week, seven years; this is the closing period, the time of the advent and work of the Messiah; the number seven marks the peculiar sacredness of this final period. In the midst of this notable week the Messiah disappears; for one part of the nation the covenant is confirmed and renewed by His death; but for the mass of the people, sacrifice is for ever abolished, and that final ruin decreed which was to be consummated by a foreign invasion.

^a [In the original, it is “seven times seven weeks,” but this would appear to be a mistake, as will be seen by referring to Dan. ix. 25.—T.R.]

It is evident that here we are dealing with vast cycles, like those with which the mind of Daniel had been familiarised by his astronomical studies. Revelation adapts itself to the conceptions of those who are to be its organs. But we must not expect history to bind itself slavishly to the exactness of those mathematical definitions of which the laws are of a different kind. History is the domain of human liberty; it cannot be controlled by the rhythm of the sacred numbers, three, seven, and ten[▼].

▼ We are aware that attempts have been made to give this astonishing prophecy interpretations of an altogether different nature; but hitherto they have been all beset with insuperable difficulties, whilst the one we have now given not only seems in harmony with the literal meaning of the text, but also finds its confirmation in history, if we do not ignore the inevitable difference between actual and ideal history, or prophecy.

Let not Israel then give itself up to chimerical expectations, which will but lead to a series of disappointments! The world is far from being ripe for salvation; Israel itself is not yet sufficiently prepared for it. But God is King of the ages, (such is the grand thought of Daniel,) and His promises will be accomplished in their time.

When Israel began to fall asleep in her prosperity, Isaiah said, "Thy God is holy; beware! awake! judgment hangs over thy head." Israel, paying no heed to this warning, gave way to the deep slumbers of sin. A little later, when the fated hour of punishment was just about to strike, Jeremiah cried, "Give glory to God! The Lord is just! Thou hast sinned. Accept without resistance the blow which falls upon thee!" Those who had escaped the national judgment, whom the first deportations had put under shelter in a foreign land, did resign themselves, but not without falling into a deep despondency. There is no more hope, they said one to another in presence of the judgment of God now completed. To them Ezekiel came, saying, "God is mighty; take courage! you will be raised up again." Soon after this Cyrus came. Delivered miraculously, Israel was now able to return to their own country. But at this moment their imagination kindles; the day of glory has arrived; the Christ is about to appear! Then Daniel calms this carnal excitement. "No," he says, "the day of glory is still far distant. You are called to persevere and to stand faithful for a long time yet—for centuries; but the day will come when the words of the Eternal God shall find their fulfilment."

Sanctify yourselves! submit yourselves! Hope! Be patient!—these are the four commands. They correspond well with the four moral situations which we have described.

Isaiah may be compared to a majestic oak, shadowing with its leafy boughs the palace of the kings of Judah in the time of its prosperity. Jeremiah is like a weeping willow, whose branches hang down to the ground, in the midst of the ruins of this deserted palace. Ezekiel reminds us of one of those aromatic Eastern plants whose vivifying odours perfume the country, and revive the heart of the fainting traveller. Daniel is like a tree rising out of the midst of a vast plain, which may be seen from all sides—a signal to guide the caravan in its march.

So has God in all ages drawn near His people, and answered with the fidelity of a father to their needs. At every critical moment, and, so to say, at every bifurcation of the road, He has been found, rising up early, (according to the beautiful expression of Jeremiah xxix. 19,) and pouring forth His saving counsels through His prophets. And all these different voices combine in one to proclaim together the master-law, the supreme principle of all history: He that exalteth himself shall be abased. It was to this law that all the powers of the ancient world—the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Greek, and the Roman monarchies—had to bow their proud heads. The littleness of Israel was no protection against the application of this great principle. As soon as it took upon itself to make its Divine election the ground of a monopoly, as soon as it dared to make itself an end in itself, instead of simply an instrument, as it was in God's purpose, the thunder-bolt which falls from heaven upon everything that exalts itself, struck it in its littleness. For, let us ever bear in mind*, that the pride of the little is no more tolerable in the eyes of the Most High than that of the great.

This law, indeed, which judged the ancient world, rules the modern world also. It is for this reason that the words of the prophets concern us still. They fell from too great a height to be of merely local or temporary application. Till the end of the world they will recal to men, dazzled with the sense of their own greatness, what they are, and what God is. Individuals, families, nations, all remain for ever subject to this law.

Has a nation attained to the summit of prosperity,—does she flatter herself that she is by her enlightenment, by her political or military organisation, or by her moral development, at the head of the world's civilisation? The Holy Spirit says to her through the mouth of Isaiah: "The lofty looks of man shall be humbled; the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day. . . . Sanctify the Lord of hosts Himself, and let Him be your fear, and let Him be your dread†."

* We Swiss people in particular.

† Isa. ii. 11; viii. 13.

Or does a nation, after having shut her ears to the Divine warnings, fall to the earth under the unforeseen judgments which overtake her, and does she lie like a wounded man bleeding upon the ground? Jeremiah comes forth and thus addresses her, "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord. . . . Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins?"

Does a nation, shattered by the chastisements of the Almighty, do homage to her heavenly Judge, and instead of madly cursing the rod which smites her, give glory to the Hand which chastens her? Then is the moment when Ezekiel cries to her, "Ye shall live, and ye shall know that I am the Lord when I shall hide my face no more from you; when I have poured out my spirit upon you^a."

Finally, does any nation, after having experienced the bright dawn of restoration, give herself up once more to ambitious hopes and earthly aspirations? Daniel comes forward and reminds her that the realisation of the golden age of the latter days is not the work of man, but of the Christ; that the abolition of social miseries can only be the result of the suppression of sin; that the era of good for mankind can only date from the day on which the Sun of Righteousness shall arise;—in short, that glory is, in the Divine order, only the crown of holiness.

^a Jer. xvii. 5; Lam. iii. 39.

^b Ezek. xxxvii. 14; xxxix. 27—29.

There are no longer Apostles—and why? Because Peter, Matthew, Paul, John, are still our Apostles. God no longer raises up prophets—why? Because Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, are still to be our prophets. Let us then study their words, not in order to try to tear asunder, in idle curiosity, the veil which hides the future; but to learn how to make constant use of the present time in view of the end; so that whenever we prepare ourselves to meditate upon their words, it may be in the spirit of an Isaiah, at the time when he bent his ear to receive the Divine message:—

“Yea, in the way of thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for thee; the desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee. With my soul have I desired thee in the night; yea, with my spirit within me will I seek thee early: for when thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness ^b.”

[See, at the end of the volume, the exegetical and critical appendix upon some of the prophetic passages to which allusion has been made.]

^b Isa. xvi. 8, 9.

THE BOOK OF JOB.

FOR the last twelve years we have possessed the book of Job in French in its original beauty, or very nearly so. The translation by Perret-Gentil had already shewed a marked improvement in the rendering of this master-piece of Semitic genius into our language. The same task has just been taken up again by M. Renan, and accomplished by him in a manner which, as it seems to us, reaches the perfection of that style of writing. The severest faithfulness to the original is throughout combined with naturalness, fluency, and purity of form. Our language, in its nature so stiff and formal, seems to have gained flexibility under the hand of the translator, and to have opened to him the secret of resources hitherto unknown. By the help of the perfect malleability of the medium so put into our hands, we have now this monument of antiquity before us in all its majestic grandeur, together with the finish of the smallest details, perfectly preserved. The reader will be able to judge for himself by the quotations we shall have to make, and which we shall generally borrow from M. Renan's version.

We wish we could give equal praise to the Essay on the origin and character of the book of Job, with which the author has prefaced his translation. It is needless to praise the clearness of the thought, the charm of the exposition, the solidity of the learning in this work. But the essential point, in our view, is this:—will this work further by a single step our apprehension of the idea which is the soul and central light of the book we are studying? We doubt it much. We should even be inclined to say, that the preliminary essay is a step backward rather than forward in the interpretation of the book as a whole, did we not know that every defective effort, by bringing into relief one side of error, serves at the same time to bring into light some new aspect of the truth.

For this essay of M. Renan's, we should wish in the following pages to substitute a new one, more fair in its results, and more fitted to place the reader at the true point of view from which to contemplate this sublime work in all its internal harmony and height of holiness. Would that, in carrying out this design, we could borrow the pen of M. Renan himself!

I.

We have, in the first place, to enquire into the origin of the book of Job. From the point of view of tradition, this is lost in the most complete obscurity. An ancient opinion, Jewish and Christian, but which seems nothing more than a conjecture, refers its composition to a time as far back as the Mosaic, or even ante-Mosaic, age. Many attribute the book of Job to Moses himself, who, according to this theory, composed it at the time when, as an exile and a fugitive, he tended the flocks of his father-in-law in the neighbourhood of Sinai.

This opinion is not so baseless as many suppose. For, in fact, we cannot but ask ourselves how it would have been possible for any Jewish writer posterior to Moses so completely to abstract himself from all the institutions of the law, and to transport himself artificially—without ever once betraying himself in the whole course of his writings—into historic circumstances so completely passed away. And again, it may be asked, whether the state of oppression of the children of Israel, in that land of Egypt which they had entered free and prosperous, did not supply the mind of the author with the historical groundwork of which he was in need in order to state the problem he treats and to find its solution. The language itself suggests an argument in favour of this view. Does not this Hebrew, saturated with Arabic like that of no other book in the Bible, belong to some far distant age, when the Semitic dialects, not yet entirely distinct, resembled branches scarcely separated as yet from the parent stem? Lastly, if, as M. Renan himself observes: “a multitude of traits indicate the author’s intimate acquaintance with Egypt, where he would seem to have travelled, and with Mount Sinai, where no doubt he must have witnessed the working of mines which he describes in such detail,” what other writer than Moses could such characteristics more exactly fit?

Nevertheless, two reasons prevent us from adopting this view of the origin of the book of Job. In the first place, the absence of those numerous archaisms which distinguish in such a remarkable manner the books of the Pentateuch, and which give them a position by themselves in the Hebrew literature; in the second place, the very advanced stage of development of philosophical thought which such a treatise presupposes. The book of Job is nothing less than a theodicy^a. The being who is brought to the bar of judgment is in reality not Job, it is Jehovah. The point in debate is not only the virtue of Job; it is at the same time and in a still higher degree, the justice of God. The problem of the book is to discover how this justice is to be reconciled with the fact of the righteous suffering. Now it is not in every age of the world that such a question could have suggested itself. Doubtless we must guard ourselves against asserting with M. Renan, that facts of the kind which furnish the theme of the book of Job never took place "till towards B.C. 1000," that "it was then that the wicked were seen in prosperity, and tyrants rewarded righteous men despoiled and driven to beg their bread." As if the dead body of Abel had not lain on the very threshold of Eden itself! As if the age before the Deluge had witnessed no scenes of violence and extortion! As if the sight of virtue oppressed had not been part of the daily lot of fallen mankind! But for such experiences to become the object of philosophical speculation, which should take shape in a literary work ad hoc, there was needed, beyond a doubt, an age pre-disposed to this kind of reflection and mental labour. And, unless we are mistaken, we must come down as far as the reign of Solomon to find such an age. It was then—not indeed that the cry of oppressed innocence first ascended to heaven—but that endeavours were made earnestly and philosophically to understand why it ascended, and how a fact so abnormal can be reconciled with the Divine Omnipotence and Justice—the two foundations of Jewish Monotheism.

^a Justification of the Divine government.

It is beyond dispute, that under the influence of the genius of Solomon, there grew up in his court a school of wisdom, or of moral philosophy, and that this phenomenon was in Israel a fact of an altogether new kind. Whilst the Levitical institutions performed their functions regularly, and the Mosaic ordinances were more and more impressing their stamp upon the life of the people, the leading minds, with the king himself at their head, were feeling the necessity of searching more deeply into the knowledge of things divine and human. Beneath the Israelite they tried then to find the man; beneath the Mosaic system, that universal principle of the moral law, of which it is the perfect expression. Thus they reached to that idea of Wisdom which is the common feature of the three books, Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes. The Divine Wisdom, in the idea of which are included the notions of intelligence, justice, and goodness, is personified as the supreme object of Divine love, and as the spirit which gives existence and order to the world, this Wisdom has marked with her stamp everything that exists in the universe; her delight is not in the Jews only, but in the children of men^b. To conform to her laws is, for man, wisdom; to act against them is folly.

This was the altogether new intuition awakened in the mind of man by the genius of Solomon—the element, intellectual and moral, which his mighty spirit called into being. He was not alone in working in this direction. All genius seems to possess the gift of electrifying its age, and of calling into being a multitude of talents of a nature akin to itself. Just as the great personalities of Alexander and Napoleon evoked a whole generation of generals of the highest order, so Solomon, the Wise Man par excellence, soon found himself surrounded by a kind of college of thinkers and writers who were the best ornament of his court, and who shared his high aims and noble labours. The names of some among them have been preserved. There were Ethan and Heman, two friends and fellow-labourers of the father of Solomon; Chalcol and Darda, the sons of Mahol^c. Within this circle the object was to humanise Judaism, to spiritualise the precepts of the Law, while guarding against the danger of undermining their authority. Thought was sending down its roots into that fundamental stratum of moral being in which the Jewish law and the human conscience find their unity. Hence the totally different impression produced upon us now by the Mosaic ordinances and the precepts contained in the book of Proverbs.

^b Prov. viii. 31.

^c 1 Kings iv. 31

Is it not from out of this Solomonian workshop, (if I may be allowed to use such an expression,) that this monumental book of Job issued, in which Semitic thought seems to have taken, in every sense, its grandest proportions? The purity and brilliancy of the language, the spirit of sympathy with mankind in general which pervades it throughout, the finish, of a somewhat artificial character, which marks it as a literary work,—all these features seem to demand such an origin as we have indicated. Our very ignorance of the name of the author is only intelligible on the supposition that this book springs from a time when such a genius was lost amongst a constellation of sages his peers, not less distinguished than himself, and was eclipsed by the fame of the monarch which outshone everything around it. M. Renan, however, has not given way to this reasoning. He thinks we must come down to a still later age. He assigns the book of Job to the time of Hosea, about B.C. 770. But how weak is the only argument he urges:—that in the prologue, the Chaldeans (Kasdim) are mentioned as a people living by rapine, whereas the Chaldeans were not known to the Jews in this character till about the time of Hosea. But why should not the contemporaries of Solomon, who seem to have known more than we do of the Eastern nations, have known that the Chaldeans were robbers two centuries before the date of those indications of the fact which have come to our knowledge? These are very slender grounds on which to rest the solution of a problem such as this.

As to the hypotheses which bring down the composition of the book of Job to a still later age—to the time of Jeremiah, or even to that of the Persian conquest (Vatke)—M. Renan seems to us to have treated them as they deserved. It would be difficult to commit a grosser literary anachronism. "The language of the book of Job is the most lucid, concise, and classical Hebrew," and yet we are to make it the work of an age of decadence!

Having thus connected the book of Job, in a general way, with the time of Solomon, may I be allowed to hazard a more precise conjecture? The question is as to the individuality of the author. Now among the wise men who formed the Round Table of that order of intellectual knighthood, of which King Solomon was the head, is mentioned Heman, one of David's three "chief singers." And we have from this very Heman a Psalm, the eighty-eighth, which presents some very remarkable points of likeness with the book of Job; so much so, that after one's attention has been once drawn to it, one cannot help asking whether the author, whose name is appended to the lesser, is not also the anonymous author of the greater of the two compositions. The Psalmist sings thus:—

"For my soul is full of troubles : and my life draweth nigh unto the grave. I am counted with them that go down into the pit: I am as a man that hath no strength: . . . Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps. Thy wrath lieth hard upon me, and thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves^d."

Who would not think he was reading one of Job's complaints, in his moments of tender melancholy and submissive sadness? The Psalmist adds:—

"Thou hast put away mine acquaintance far from me; Thou hast made me an abomination unto them."

This is but the summing up of the sad and heart-piercing discussions of Job with his friends.

"Why hidest thou thy face from me?
While I suffer thy terrors I am distracted.
Thy fierce wrath goeth over me. . . .
They compassed me about together. . . ."

Just so does Job express himself in the critical moments when his spirit is troubled within him.

Once more, the concluding words of the Psalm give strong confirmation to this identification for which we are contending:—

"My lovers and friends hast thou put away from me, And hid mine acquaintance out of my sight."

As we read such words, do we not feel the author we are looking for near at hand? This Psalm is a book of Job in brief. It is like the sketch after which the great picture was afterwards drawn. What the forty-fifth Psalm is to the Song of Songs, that this ^d Ps. lxxxviii. 3, 4, 6, 7.

Psalms is to that other great production of the Solomonian wisdom, upon which we are now occupied.

Whatever may be thought of this conjecture, one thing seems now clear to all critics; it is that we are not to look for the author of the book of Job outside the Jewish people. This is proved by the classical Hebrew in which it is written, and by the purely Jewish name of Jehovah which is used in the historical parts, in the prologue and epilogue, and in the connecting narratives in the body of the book*; whilst in the discourses of the friends and of Elihu, God is designated by the names El Shaddai, and Eloah, which are equally in use among other Semitic nations.

It is true that M. Renan, while attributing the composition to a Jewish author, sees nevertheless "in these precious pages, an echo of the ancient wisdom of Theman." He seems to forget that from the point of view of the author of the book, the ancient Idumean wisdom speaks through the friends, and especially through Eliphaz, and that in the end this wisdom is charged with folly.

Far, then, from seeing in these pages an echo, we should find in them rather a criticism of the much-vaunted wisdom of Theman. This wisdom, with its commonplaces about the Divine justice, comes into conflict with a problem which nothing but the living Monotheism of Israel—Jehovahism, if I may so say—can solve.

* Job xxxviii. 1; xl. 1; xlii. 1.

II.

The second preliminary question which comes before us is that of the character of this ancient document.

In its substance, is it history or fiction?

In its form, is it epic or dramatic?

With regard to the first point, most critics are agreed now in thinking that the story of the sufferings and struggles of Job is neither pure history nor mere fiction.

Poetry among the ancients was never wholly a creation. As M. Ewald observes: "An entire invention either of a person, or of a history, is a thing unknown in the earliest antiquity of all nations." Generally speaking, poetry prefers to make use of known facts and persons, and to elevate them to the height and transparent character of the ideal.

But neither, on the other hand, could one take the narrative of the book of Job for a literal history. The stamp of poetry is visible upon all parts of the book. The name Job, which means the attacked, is probably symbolical; the celestial scene in the prologue can scarcely be taken in a literal sense; the symbolical numbers 3 and 7 predominate in the picture of Job's possessions before his misfortunes; the interview between Job and his friends is carried on with too great a regularity, (the discussion having been opened by the first discourse of Job, each friend answers him three times; and he himself, replying directly to all three, thus speaks, in all, nine times,) to be strictly historical. Elihu speaks three times like each of the friends, then a fourth time to assert the defeat of Job; the appearance of Jehovah could not in this place be a literal fact; in the picture of the prosperity of Job after his misfortunes, there occur only the same, or multiples of the same figures as in the prologue, (the same number of sons and of daughters; 14,000 sheep instead of 7,000, &c.)

True history does not move with such regularity. This kind of sustained rhythm is an indication, or note of poetry.

It is, then, probable that the Jewish author possessed himself of some ancient Idumean narrative, in order to append to it, by the help of very free handling, the discussion of the great religious problem which it was his purpose to solve.

The words of Ezekiel¹, however, presuppose in the mind of that prophet a conviction of the historic reality of the person of Job.

Between the two kinds of poetry under which the book of Job might be classed, it seems to me that the choice admits of no doubt. Led astray, perhaps, by the serious and melancholy aspect of the subject, and by the preponderance of dialogue in its treatment, some critics have looked at the book of Job as a dramatic composition, a *tragedy*². But the two passages, purely historical, which form the opening and close of the poem, are against this view. So are also the connecting narratives and historical passages in the body of the book^h. The action of the story develops itself much more under the form of an epic. The point on which it turns is not indeed the possession of a captive, as in the Iliad, but the conquest of the truth upon a vital point of Monotheism. The winged arrows, in such a contest, are words; the single combat, on this battle-field, is the dialogue.

¹ xiv. 14.

² See the remarkable work of M. Jules Sandoz, Revue Chretienne, 1859, No. 2.

Would it be a sin against the reverence due to the sacred book, to go so far as to draw the following parallel: Achilles, governed at first by his resentment, obstinately resists the supplications of the other chiefs; he begins, however, to yield, under the gentle reproaches of Patroclus; and finally, when Jupiter interposes with the blow of the death of his friend, he surrenders; and throwing himself into the schemes of Destiny, he takes arms and makes the cause of Greece to triumph. Just so does Job at first harden himself against the exhortations of his friends, who presume to explain the inexplicable at his expense. The sweet music of the discourses of Elihu begins to soften his heart; he does not yet adore, but he makes no more accusations, nor does he even reply. At length, when the majesty of Jehovah appears and reveals to him his own nothingness, offering up his grief unreservedly upon the altar of faith, he gives glory to the God whom he cannot comprehend, and makes His cause to triumph over that of Satan.

If this comparison is not forced, it proves sufficiently to what class of literary work the book of Job belongs. There is one dramatic work in the Bible, but only one—the Song of Songs. There are two epics; that of the human conscience in conflict with the Justice of God,—the book of Job; and that of the kingdom of Satan in conflict with the kingdom of God,—the Apocalypse.

^h See Job iii. 1; iv. 1, &c.; and above all, xxxii. 1—8.

III.

Let us now study more closely the course of the action. The narrative is composed of five parts: the prologue, the discussion of Job with his friends, the speeches of Elihu, the appearance and the discourses of Jehovah, and the epilogue.

1. In the prologue, three persons are on the scene:—Job, the Almighty, Satan.

The country of Job is the land of Uz, the situation of which is determined by some passages in other parts of the Bible¹. It was a district of the desert of Arabia, adjacent to the eastern part of Idumea.

The age in which Job lived is nowhere directly stated; but several features of the book prove that it was the author's intention to place it in very remote times. The only piece of money mentioned in the whole book is the kesita, a coin which belongs to the patriarchal period². The only instruments of music alluded to, the tambourine, the guitar, and the haut-boy, (according to M. Renan's version,) are precisely those mentioned in Genesis^k. The 140 years of prosperity added to the years which preceded his misfortunes (he was probably about seventy at that time) correspond to what is told us in Genesis as to the longevity of the patriarchs.

¹ Jer. xxv. 20; Lam. iv. 21.

² Compare Job xlii. 11 with Gen. xxxiii. 19.

As to the social position of Job, M. Pierre Leroux, in his fanciful essay on the book before us (an essay which contains, however, here and there observations worth consideration), remarks that we must not think of Job as a nomadic Arab, but as a rich proprietor, even more settled than was Abraham at Beersheba, or at any other place during his peregrinations. It is in a house and not under a tent that his sons and daughters are assembled when death overtakes them. His oxen are ploughing when the Sabeans carry them off^l. Job invokes the curse of God upon himself "if his land cries against him; if he has eaten the fruits thereof without money; and if the furrows of his fields have been watered with the tears of his labourers" deprived of their wages. These are the concluding words of his imprecation: "Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley^m." It is evident that, in addition to the wealth of the powerful nomad, consisting in flocks of all kinds, Job has besides that of a great landed proprietor.

In the prologue, God is not only the Almighty, the Supreme Being, (Shaddai) or the mysterious Being, Lord of all the forces of Nature, and feared by all ^k Compare Job xxi. 12; xxx. 31, with Gen. iii. 21; xxv. 27.

^l Job i. 18 and 15.

^m Job xxxi. 38—40.

(Elohim). He is the Absolute Being, unique, before whom all is as nothing—He who revealed Himself to Israel as their national God under the name of Jehovah. Unknown still to all other nations, He stands nevertheless in relations with them, looking with complacency upon every one “in every nation, who feareth Him and worketh righteousness,” as says S. Peter^a. The use of the name Jehovah both in the prologue and epilogue, as well as the appearance and revelation of Jehovah Himself^o—prelude of his future revelation to the nations outside the theocracy—indicate a very decided humanitarian tendency in this book.

Satan appears here with all the traits which characterise him in the Hebrew Monotheism, a high dignity of origin, a perfidious malignity, a spirit of timid dependence, considerable power, but strictly limited by the Will of Him Who entrusts him with it. M. Renan himself acknowledges it: “This is quite a different person from the Ahriman of the Avesta. It is not the spirit of evil existing and acting for himself . . .; he does nothing but by the command of God.” It would seem that it was from this picture of the prologue in Job, that S. James derived that striking saying: “The devils believe and tremble^p.” To this scene, more than to any other, apply the words of a modern Christian writer: “Satan can only go to the end of his chain^q.” Hence we may see what is to be thought of that common rationalistic assertion, that the Jews borrowed their

^a Acts x. 85.

^o Job xxxviii.—xli.

^p James ii. 19.

^q John Newton.

ideas of good and evil angels from the Persian religion. M. Renan says very aptly: "This part of the theology of the book of Job, (the theory of angels and devils,)—excepting, perhaps, the speech of Elihu—does not overpass the circle of the beliefs which we find among the Hebrews before they came into contact with Assyria and Persia."

Here, then, are the three personages. Into what relation are they entering with each other? God, the Author, Judge, and Rewarder of good in the universe, declares before the heavenly assembly, His satisfaction in the piety of Job. Satan, the representative of scepticism as to all virtue that has not passed through trial, does not give way to this judgment of God. God, instead of forcibly suppressing his insinuations, Himself draws forth the expression of them:—

"Hast thou considered my servant Job?"

Satan, having no accusation to make against the outward conduct of Job, calls in question the purity of his secret motives:—

"Doth Job fear God for nought?"

There is no great merit in faithfully serving a master who heaps benefits upon you, and pays you so highly for your services. Satan seems to say that, in case of need, he would do as much himself.

This malignant insinuation seems at first sight to strike Job alone, but in reality it is an attack upon

God Himself. For if the most pious of mankind is incapable of loving God gratuitously—that is, really,—it follows that God has not the power to make Himself loved. Now, as it is the perfection of a being to love, so it is his glory to be loved. It is in this sense that S. Paul says, “The woman is the glory of the man^r.” The being who is unable to excite an emotion of disinterested love, were he the most powerful of all beings, is nevertheless the neediest and the most humiliated. The most telling blow, therefore, which can be inflicted upon the Divine honour, is to assert that even the most devout worshipper of God upon earth only serves Him with this arrière-pensée: “what shall I gain by it?” If it be so, God is nothing more than a potentate flattered by cowards; He has no friends, no children, nothing but mercenaries and slaves. The lamp of God’s glory dies in this impure breath. The Seraphim must change their hymn and say, “Heaven and earth are empty of thy glory.”

Satan has then discovered the vulnerable point in God Himself. The instinct of hatred has served him well. NO ONE IS HONOURED EXCEPT SO FAR AS HE IS LOVED; he knows this well himself by the opposite experience. While shooting that fiery dart, which reduces to ashes the piety of Job, it is in reality at the heart of God that he has aimed. . . . and he has hit his mark.

From that moment the position of God becomes a strange one. It is like that of a father having an exemplary and devoted son, upon whom he delights to heap tokens of his affection. Suddenly, some suspicious guest throws out a hint that the good conduct of his son springs only from the speculations of self-interest, and that in reality this young man is rather making gain out of him than serving him. What is to be done? Merely put aside the accusation?—But there is a law which says that “there is nothing hidden that shall not be brought to light.” Now that which brings into full light the hidden nature of each thing, is trial, trial only.The father accepts the challenge which is contained in the stranger’s insinuation; he takes away from his son all that constituted his joy and happiness, and inflicts upon him, without apparent reason, the severest treatment and most grievous mortifications. So does God decide to act with regard to Job; and it is thus the action begins. It is really a kind of solemn wager between God and Satan, from which disgrace must ensue to one or the other. Satan, confident of the goodness of his cause, and of the weakness of Job, God’s champion, proposes this form of trial:—

^r 1 Cor. xi. 7.

“Put forth thine hand now and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.”

God accepts the proposal, while reserving on His part the safety of Job’s person. The blows of the invisible foe fall, one after another, upon the property and upon the family of the patriarch. In a few hours Job finds himself destitute, reduced to beggary, deprived of his children. Nevertheless he will not deny God, but prostrates himself, and adores the Hand which, after having given so much, has thought good to take all away.

Satan does not yet consider himself defeated. So long as the person of Job is untouched, the trial in his opinion is not decisive:—

“Put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face.”

Jehovah agrees to this aggravation of the trial, but still reserving on His part the life of Job. And now we see God's faithful servant smitten with leprosy,—that malady which more than any other is accounted a sign of the Divine displeasure; and he sits, weeping, among the ashes. To this accumulation of calamity, his wife's faith gives way:—

“Curse God and die.”

But that of Job still holds firm:—

“Shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil?”

Nevertheless, the limits of the trial are not yet reached, nor is the victory finally gained.

2. In front of the curtain, which hides from earth the scene which has just taken place in the invisible world, there are men; there is one being consumed by suffering—others who are spectators of this boundless grief. All alike are believers in the omnipotence and justice of Jehovah. What will they think of the blows which His Hand has struck? Perhaps in this, there lies for Job an aggravation of grief and trial. He has stood firm against the voice of coarse unbelief which spoke through the mouth of his wife. But if piety itself takes up arms against his faith, will it be able to withstand this new assault? Will it pass unscathed through this last fiery ordeal? Satan will certainly not own himself vanquished, and the cause of God will not really have triumphed in the person of its martyr, until, in a desperate struggle with the traditional belief of his age, Job shall have upheld the rights of God without surrendering those of his own conscience, and the rights of his conscience without denying those of God, even should the most irreconcilable of conflicts seem to oppose one of these to the other.

The three friends who come to visit Job, form together with him, (as is well shewn by M. Schlottmann,) a kind of confraternity or social aristocracy, intellectual and religious, in the midst of surrounding tribes, who seem to have belonged to a stage of civilisation far less high than their own. They are rich, practised in the art of speech, Monotheists and Semites, while the inhabitants of those regions are poor, rude, idolaters, and probably Hamites. They might be compared to those Dutch farmers, who, under the name of Boers, have formed in our modern times a well-known state in the south of Africa. Rich, powerful, armed in European style, attached to the Christian faith and civilisation, these colonists are united with each other in a formidable association, and they hold under their sway entire countries and numerous African populations. Just such as these appear to have been Job—before he was cast into the abyss of misery, Eliphaz the Temanite, (the name of a country in Idumea,) Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, (these two last countries are unknown to us).

For seven days and seven nights, the friends of Job sit by him in silence. At length Job, as if he felt there was something ill-omened in this long-continued stillness, himself breaks it. And his words are like a flash of lightning in a heavy and oppressive atmosphere:—

“Let the day perish in which I was born,
And the night in which it was said, There is a man child conceived!”

The contrast between the tone of this exclamation and the last words of Job in the prologue, is evidently due to the manner, so offensive to him and so full of secret accusations, of his three friends.

After the first discourse of Job, each friend, as we have said, speaks three times; Job replies at once to each. But at his last turn, Zophar, the third of the friends, foregoes his speech, as a sign of his inability to convince Job; and the latter then speaks three times consecutively, as if to shew that he is left in possession of the field.

The principal thoughts which, uttered at first with reserve, and then spoken out by degrees more and more clearly, form the theme of the discourses of the friends, are these:—

First, God is just—He does not dispense happiness and misery arbitrarily.

Secondly, (a corollary of the first): Your extraordinary ill-fortune is a certain proof of hidden and exceptional crimes, of which you are guilty.

Thirdly, (and this is the consolation which they think to bring him): If, by a sincere repentance, you do honour to the truth, God will pardon and restore you.

The author varies and graduates, in an admirable manner, the development of these theses which he puts into the mouth of the three friends. They are set forth by Eliphaz with sacerdotal pathos, by Bildad with a moderation less rich in ideas, and by Zophar with a kind of passionateness.

In the first cycle (as far as the fourteenth chapter), the accusation of the friends comes out only with much reserve, and in ambiguous words. They still hope to gain over Job to their way of looking at things, and to bring him to confess his secret faults. In the second cycle (to the twenty-first chapter), their language assumes a character more and more severe and threatening. By his proud demeanour, Job produces upon them increasingly the impression that he is a real malefactor. His pride at once repels and astounds them. Finally, in the third cycle (to the thirty-first chapter), Eliphaz gives definite expression to the accusation till then withheld; and adds to it a final and vigorous appeal to the conscience of Job; Bildad confines himself to rejecting haughtily his answers. The third friend, concluding that nothing can be done with so hardened a being, gives up his turn of speaking altogether*.

It is clear that in reasoning in this manner, the friends are only giving expression to the received theory of their time, which admits of no other law, for the distribution of human suffering, than the quantum of the sins of each person. Poor Job! To extol in this sense the Divine Justice before him, is to stab him—to annihilate him.

And how does he bear himself in this terrible crisis? Upon the ground of mere reason he is defeated. For he knows of no theology different from that of his friends, under which he might shelter himself against the blows with which they transfix him. In order to make a victorious answer, he must know that scene in the prologue, which alone gives the clue to the dispensation of which he is the object. But he knows it not. He is in the position of the son of whom we were just now speaking, at the time when his brothers, noticing the sudden severity with which his father treats him, ask him in terror, "What hast thou done?" and with a mixture of compassion and horror, urge him to confess the fault which has brought upon him the anger of so just a being. The poor youth can make but one answer: "I know nothing—absolutely nothing. But our father is just. It is true I no longer understand his conduct. I appeal to himself better informed."

* See the beautiful exposition of this gradation in Schultz: Sechs Reden zu den Kirchlichen Fragen der Gegenwart, 1869, (in the essay upon Job).

And his brothers misunderstand him more than ever, and add to their former insinuations the charge of an insurmountable pride.

Just so, Job has no answer to make to the reasoning of his friends. He has only the witness of his own conscience. But that is enough for him. For here is the rock against which all the charges made against him will be shattered, and even the very principle upon which they are based—that of strict retribution. We must not then look for a complete logical force in his speeches, like that which pervades the speeches of his friends. There are, from his point of view, two conflicting elements: the theory of retribution, which seems to him inseparable from faith in the justice of God,—and the unwavering testimony of his conscience, which, in his present circumstances, protests against this theory. Hence his perplexity. The conflict within him is not between good and evil, but between good and good—between the justice of God affirmed by his conscience, and his relative innocence, no less firmly attested by that inner and sacred voice; so much so, that he feels himself driven logically either to give the lie to his conscience, if he would still uphold the justice of God, or deny God, if he would maintain the truth of his conscience. Terrible position! which constitutes precisely the climax of the trial of which he is unconsciously the subject. This moral situation is also a master-piece of epic art. What was the wrath of Achilles at the abduction of a captive, compared to this inward conflict of Job, whose distracted conscience can no longer do homage to God without contradicting itself!

Accordingly, his discourses are like the broken utterances of one in a fever. But in the midst of these apparent incoherences, one may observe, nevertheless, a succession of touches of admirable psychological truth.

In the first cycle he gives expression to the grief caused him by the attitude which his friends had taken; he compares them to a brook in the desert, in whose water a caravan had trusted, but which is found dried up when its banks are reached; then he acknowledges that he shares the general infirmity:—

“How should man be just with God?
If he will contend with him,
He cannot answer him one of a thousand.”

But what a difference between that and the crimes of which they suspect him! Besides, facts do not agree with this dogmatic assertion—that the righteous man is always fortunate, and the wicked always unhappy. And now, in the place of the abstract God Whom his friends offer to him, Who seems but to play the part of a lifeless weighing machine, on one scale of which should be written vice, on the other, misery—he sets a living personal God; but One who carries liberty even to caprice, and Who, sheltered Himself behind His rampart of clouds, shoots forth His arrows as it pleases Him, without giving account to any one of what He does. Sometimes he seems even to border on blasphemy, and to deny all moral character to the use which the Almighty makes of His power. He appeals from the God who smites him. . . . But to Whom? To no other than to God Himself; he appeals from the traditional God of his friends—from that iron mask which their pitiless hand would force upon him, to that new God Whom his own heart foreshadows, and Whose advent he invokes:—

“He will laugh at the trial of the innocent:
The earth is given into the hands of the wicked. . .
The tabernacles of robbers prosper,
They that provoke God are secure;
Into whose hand God bringeth abundantly†.

“Neither is there any daysman betwixt us,
That might lay his hand upon us both. . .
If I be wicked, woe unto me;
And if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head.

“Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him:
But I will maintain mine own ways before him.
Behold now, I have ordered my cause;
I know that I shall be justified. . .
Withdraw thine hand far from me:

† Who recognise no God but their own violence (Renan).

And let not thy dread make me afraid.
Then call thou, and I will answer :
Or let me speak, and answer thou me^u."

This infinite unfathomable freedom of the personal and living God, which he transforms at times into absolute caprice,—it is upon that that he casts himself for refuge when he knows not where to find shelter against the inexorable logic of his friends. In these bold appeals to a God Who appears to be hiding Himself as in cowardice, and Whom he summons in a manner to the bar in the name of his aggrieved conscience, is contained really the grandest homage to that holiness of the Divine character which passes all human understanding.

The second cycle sets before us, as says Schultz, Job drawing steadily nearer to God, as his friends withdraw themselves from him. Doubtless it is by means of a violent conflict that this intimacy is formed and strengthened. But the more clearly he sees himself delivered up, friendless and helpless, to a doom to him inexplicable, the more does he rise to the triumphant conviction that God will be his avenger, the witness to his innocence. No, whatever may happen, he shall not perish; leprosy may eat up his flesh, and even consume his bones; his friends may bring against him the gravest charges . . . but what does it matter? It is to God alone that he will for the future carry his appeal. He is sure of God—yes sure of Him even at the very time when this God seems to be doing everything to ruin him :—

^u Job ix. 23, 24; xii. 6; ix. 33; x. 15; xiii. 15, 18, 21, 22.

“My witness is in heaven,
And my record is on high.
My friends scorn me :
But mine eye poureth out tears unto God.
Oh that my words were now written !
Oh that they were printed in a book !
That they were graven with an iron pen
And lead in the rock for ever !
For I know that my redeemer liveth,
And that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth :
And though after my skin worms destroy this body,
Yet in my flesh shall I see God :
Whom I shall see for myself,
And mine eyes shall behold, and not another *.”

This is the passage in which Job attains to the culminating point of his hope in God. Does he express in these words his hope of a mere cure, when it shall please God to suspend the ravages of leprosy, and to say to that incurable disease, “Thus far and no further?” Or does he, despairing of all cure here below, cast himself upon the certainty of a resurrection, properly so called? Between these two interpretations which have divided commentators, would not Job perhaps have himself hesitated? Does he not feel his ignorance as to how God will dispose of this body, this living skeleton, in which he is still suffering and groaning? But what he does know for certain is that, whether by means of a cure, or else by means of a resurrection, LIVE HE SHALL—for his redeemer lives. All the truths that Jesus draws, in Matt. xxii. 32, from the expression “the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob,” are comprehended in this cry of faith from the patriarch: “My Redeemer liveth!”

* Job xvi. 19, 20; xix. 23—27.

After this supreme effort, in the third cycle the heart of Job is softened; and his speech, always splendid in its magnificence, expresses pain of a more contrite and gentle character. He pictures to his friends the insoluble problem of human existence; he makes them understand that the wisdom which can solve riddles such as these is not given to man. He retraces once more, in a burst of poetry never surpassed, the picture of his past greatness; he sets alongside of his present misery that life free from all the crimes with which they charge him; and resuming the tone of a consciousness of innocence which no fear, even in presence of the Most High, can weaken, he cries at last:—

“Oh that one would hear me!

Behold, my desire is, that the Almighty would answer me,
And that mine adversary had written a book.”

I do not hesitate to say that this is the most admirable section of the whole book. Although much the hardest to interpret, it is nevertheless the most accessible to the afflicted spirit.

3. A younger man than the friends of Job had been present at the interview. Seeing the champions of Divine justice put to silence, and Job left in possession of the field of battle, Elihu, whom a feeling of deference had hitherto kept silent, now opens his mouth and gives vent to the feelings which oppress him. As Ehler so well said, he is indignant with Job, "because he could only justify himself by accusing God; and indignant with the friends, because they could only justify God by accusing Job."

The four discourses which are put into his mouth are the development of two great thoughts.

First, what the friends ought to have said to Job and what Job ought to have remembered, is that there are pains, which, without being a retribution for any actual faults, are fitted for purifying man from the seeds of sin contained in his heart, and to save him from falls to which he might be exposed:—

"God speaketh once, yea twice,
Yet man perceiveth it not.
In a dream, in a vision of the night,
When deep sleep falleth upon men :
Then he openeth the ears of men,
And sealeth their instruction,
That he may withdraw man from his purpose,
And hide pride from man. . . .
He is chastened also with pain upon his bed,
And the multitude of his bones with strong pain :
So that his life abhorreth bread,
And his soul dainty meat.
His flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen ;
And his bones that were not seen stick out. . . .
If there be a messenger with him, an interpreter,
One among a thousand,
To shew unto man his uprightness :

Then he is gracious unto him. . . .
His flesh shall be fresher than a child's:
He shall return to the days of his youth*."

The application of these words to Job is evident. In addition to the internal warnings which God gives to men to save them from sin, particularly from the pride which so easily accompanies prosperity, He has given Job external trials,—especially that of sickness. But let Job find a heavenly friend who will reveal to him the reason of his trial, and his restoration will not be delayed.

The second thought is: Even if we do not arrive at understanding the ways of God, He shews Himself too great and too wise in all nature to allow us to entertain a doubt of His perfection. God is not a mere "satrap," tempted to abuse a power only lent him for a time. He is the Sovereign; and we may therefore depend upon His justice.

To accept suffering as a purifying ordeal or as a preventive warning, in which conscience cannot recognise a punishment, and to submit entirely, looking to God with the docility of faith—even to such as we can in no degree understand either as punishment or as trial—this is the whole wisdom of Elihu. It is slightly common-place, it may be said; but its originality consists in the contrast between it and the spurious wisdom of the friends and the rash language of Job. It is not the complete explanation of the mystery,—Elihu knows nothing of the scene in the prologue,—but until the veil is lifted, this is, and remains the true wisdom. Accordingly, Job does not answer. He does not yet confess himself defeated; but he no longer argues. It is the beginning of his complete submission.

* Job xxxiii. 14—21, 23, 25.

The authenticity of the speeches of Elihu has been strongly attacked; so much so, that it requires now some courage to undertake their defence. Are they then missing in any manuscript? No. The following are the reasons alleged:—

There is no mention of this fourth friend, either in the prologue or epilogue. His appearance upon the scene, and his speeches are, therefore, it is said, a later interpolation. But this argument is weak. Elihu is not a fourth friend. It is expressly said that “his wrath was kindled against Job and against his three friends.” He was too young to take up such a position; besides, his presence had not the same formal character as that of the friends; it was not a visit, properly so called, as theirs was. There is here a very ingenious stroke of art. For by this means his intervention is made to take the form of a surprise, and the author ingeniously takes up the thread of the narrative, just when it seemed at the point of breaking. As to the silence on the subject of Elihu in the epilogue, that is natural. He can neither be praised as having solved the problem, nor blamed as having spoken wrongly. He has said nothing but the truth, though not the whole truth.

Elihu speaks four times; this, it is said, indicates the touch of a later hand. But does not Job do the same in his last discourse? The orator pauses a moment each time to let his adversary answer if he thinks fit. The fact that he himself resumes his speech after each of these pauses, amounts therefore to nothing more than a repeated avowal of powerlessness on the part of Job.

The difference of style is next alleged. "The style of Elihu," says M. Renan, "is cold and pretentious." Every one knows how often such judgments are a mere result of individual taste. But what seems to us, in this case, to take away all force from the argument drawn from a difference of style, is that M. Renan concludes by attributing the so-called interpolated passage to the author of the book himself, who, he thinks, must have completed his work "at a time when he had lost his vigour." M. Renan gives us back with one hand what he had taken away with the other. We gather from this avowal a sure testimony to the identity of the author; and that, it seems to us, sufficiently settles the question of authenticity.

Finally, we are told that these discourses of Elihu are a mere repetition of those of Jehovah, and bring confusion into the plan of the poem. The two last speeches of Elihu treat, it is true, of the same theme as those of Jehovah—the greatness of God in Nature. But the two first set forth quite a different idea, and one which is essential to the complete treatment of the subject—the idea of suffering as a means of purification. By this means Elihu begins to soften the heart of Job, so much wounded by the cruelty of his friends; he thus prepares the way for that complete submission which is to be consummated by the appearance of Jehovah. Nothing is abler, better managed, and in some respects more indispensable, psychologically speaking, than this intermediate part. As the gentle exhortation of Elihu forms the transition from the hard words of the friends to the solemn revelation of Jehovah, so does the silence of Job before Elihu form the transition between his haughty answers to his friends, and his humble and complete self-humiliation before Jehovah.

Far, then, from being a mere by-play in the plan of the book, this passage is an indispensable feature of it. It is like the gentle exhortation of a younger and religious-minded brother, intended to recal to the mind of that elder brother, of whom we have before spoken, the character of their common father, and what may be the blessed consequences of the trial, if accepted with a docile mind. Let the father himself afterwards come in and speak in the same sense, but with the authority of his position, and the work will be thereby completed.

4. More than once Job had called upon God to shew Himself. Elihu had had a presentiment of, and had announced His approach :—

“At this also my heart trembleth,
And is moved out of his place.

Hear attentively the noise of his voice,
And the sound that goeth out of his mouth ^b."

More than this, he had by degrees prepared the heart of Job to receive this visitation in a spirit of profound self-abasement. Elihu was, as it were, the forerunner of Jehovah.

Jehovah appears; twice over He overwhelms Job with the majesty of His words. In the first discourse He treats of this question: Thou who pretendest to be able to judge My ways, canst thou understand this universe? The second turns upon this: Wilt thou try to govern the world in My place, and to do so better than I? This is the development of the second of the two subjects treated by Elihu, but with a more magnificent richness of language, and a more triumphant power. The inferiority of Elihu's speeches, which M. Renan uses as an argument against their authenticity, is explained precisely by this fact, that the author was reserving the fulness of his power to make Jehovah speak in a manner worthy of Himself. It is remarkable that the first subject drawn out by Elihu—the purifying effect of affliction—is nowhere reproduced in these discourses of Jehovah. The dignity of God did not allow Him even to enter upon self-justification. It is still more evident that He would not condescend to acquaint Job with the scene narrated in the prologue. For this would be to violate the very conditions of that kind of contest in which He had thought fit to engage. What had passed behind the veil must remain hidden from Job till the end of the trial appointed for him; the champion of God must win, not by sight, but by faith; by moral conviction with no help from the light of reason. And in the end, this victory of faith is completely reached:—

^b Job xxxvii. 1, 2.

“I am vile; what shall I answer thee?
I will lay mine hand upon my mouth.”

This is Job's reply to the first discourse of the Eternal.

“I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear,
But now mine eye seeth thee:
Wherefore I abhor myself,
And repent in dust and ashes.”

This is his confession at the end of the second discourse.

The words which Job retracts in this manner, are by no means such a denial of Jehovah as Satan had expected, and which he had predicted in those insulting words, “See if he will not curse thee to thy face.” During his long debate with his friends, Job never for a moment thought of renouncing God, or of seeking help from the superstitions of the idolatrous religions around. He was only seeking to free himself from too narrow a conception of God and of His ways, and so to rise to a loftier point of view from which to overlook a wider horizon. His complaints were the cries of one in misery, driven to extremity, rebelling against a fictitious God—a true Medusa's head, the very look of which turned him to stone—and carrying his appeal to another God Whom he was unable to define, but without Whom he felt he could not live.

5. The victory having now been gained, a double crown is placed upon the conqueror's head. This is the subject of the epilogue.

Whilst God denounces His anger against Eliphaz and his two friends, because the common-places they had uttered so magisterially, were destitute, if so applied, of all moral truth, Job receives from the mouth of God a striking declaration of His satisfaction, because amidst all the exaggerations which have escaped him, he has himself always spoken sincerely. A heterodoxy which is frank and true-hearted finds more favour in the sight of God than a strict and cold orthodoxy. Eliphaz and his friends, as the climax of their humiliation, only obtain pardon on condition that Job, whom suffering has now consecrated to be God's priest, shall accompany with his intercessions the expiatory sacrifice which they are to be called upon to offer.

Thus God gives Job an opportunity of adding to his submission to Himself, an act of sublime generosity towards the friends who have treated him so cruelly. This is the seal set to the complete moral victory he has won. But this is only the first half of Job's triumph. He is afterwards raised to a position of earthly splendour, not only equal to that which had preceded his trials, but superior to it.

Just as the father of whom we spoke, after he was assured of the complete submission of his son, casts upon the stranger whose suspicions have introduced a temporary disturbance into the internal relations of the family, an indignant and expressive look, and then, pressing to his heart with redoubled tenderness the son who had suffered so cruelly for him and through him, heaps upon him thenceforth his favours and endearments; so does God pour out upon Job all the tokens of His love, as if to make up to him for the extreme anguish which he had gone through for the manifestation of His glory both in heaven and in hell.

IV.

Such is the plan of the narrative. This analysis seems to us sufficiently to demonstrate the unity of the book, and the harmony of its different parts. It remains now to draw out the central idea of it, and for that purpose to get a firmer grasp of the problem proposed, and of the solution offered.

Every reader of the Bible who was asked what is the question treated in the book of Job, would answer without hesitation—the problem of human suffering. But this answer is too vague. The question which occupies the mind of the author is not—why does man suffer? but why should even the innocent be called upon to do so? The problem is to account for that disproportion between the amount of the sin of any individual man and his suffering, which is apparent in so many cases. This difficulty would be especially pressed upon the minds of the Israelites under the influence of the lex talionis proclaimed with such energy in the Mosaic code; but it might also suggest itself in all countries, and to all nations, since, even outside of the discipline of law, the conscience of mankind is offended at the sight of the sufferings of the righteous, and is compelled to ask itself how such facts can be reconciled with the justice of God.

Such, without doubt, is the problem which the author sets before himself. What is the solution of it which he offers? And is this solution put before us with such characteristics of lucidity and truth, as can satisfy us perfectly?

1. M. Renan thinks not. According to his view, the author has very clearly perceived the weakness of the old patriarchal theory, according to which the wicked are always punished, and the righteous always rewarded here on earth. He rejects, with good reason, the crying injustice which this superficial interpretation of the Divine dispensations involves. But he seeks in vain to substitute for it any better explanation. He finds no way out of the circle in which Jewish thought is imprisoned, and out of which man can only effect his escape by a bold appeal to the future. There are moments when Job seems to draw aside the veil which hides from us the mystery of the future life; he prophesies that he will be avenged, and that in his flesh he shall see God. But these gleams of light are each time followed by a darkness still more profound. The old patriarchal idea still weighs down the author's spirit. The sight of the misery of the righteous plunges him once more into deep trouble of mind; and, in the epilogue, he returns to that bare and naked theory of retribution which he had for a moment tried to throw off; for it is on this earth that Job is avenged, and that his fortune is restored to him. So that the book ends with that same doctrine of temporal rewards and punishments, which it seemed at one time intended to combat and eradicate.

Were the book of Job really nothing more than such a tissue as this of inconsistencies and contradictions, it would be difficult to understand the extraordinary power which it has had in all ages over the minds of men, and how it could deserve the title of "the ideal of a Semitic poem," which M. Renan assigns to it. Unless we attribute to the author a mind most inconsistent, as well as most sublime, we must say that the theory of exact retribution for sin by suffering, is absolutely and conclusively refuted in the interview between Job and his friends, and that after having received this decisive blow, it could not be raised again in the remainder of the book.

2. Accordingly, a certain number of interpreters, De Wette, for instance, attribute to this poem no other purpose but that of combating the doctrine of retribution on earth, as it was taught by the Mosaic law. But in that case, we should have to confess that the epilogue is in direct contradiction with the idea of the book; and should have no choice left but to suppress it altogether by one of those arbitrary decrees which critics, in our day, allow themselves so freely. Besides, Wisdom among the Israelites never set herself in opposition to Mosaicism. She sought foundations for the law in the nature of things, and in the moral constitution of man; she followed out its applications in all the details of life; but never did she set herself in antagonism with it; she always respected it as the highest expression of the Divine Will. The explanation of De Wette is liable to the objection that it would in some sort reduce the whole book to chapters iv—xxxii.

3. M. Jules Sandoz*, struck especially with the former of the two theses unfolded in the speeches of Elihu, thinks that the author after having, in the discussions of Job and his friends, definitively put aside the theory of suffering as retributive and punitive, wishes to substitute for it that of suffering as a means of the purification and education of man in his moral nature. From this point of view, "pain," he says, "takes a new meaning and name; it is called trial. It is to the moral nature of man what the refining-pot is to the metal, and at the bottom of the bitterest cup, he who can drink it without repining, will find happiness." It is in this light also that Hengstenberg understands the object of the book of Job. According to him, it is the mission of this book to initiate the believer into the sanctifying use of the cross, and to teach him so to suffer as to draw from trial the blessings which it is intended to bring him. The characteristic idea of the book, from this point of view, would be found in ch. xxxii. and xxxiii., which contain the first discourses of Elihu. We have affirmed without hesitation the authenticity of this part of the book, and have proved, we hope, its importance, and even necessity. But if we are to look there for the solution proposed by the author, what would be the use of the discourse of Elihu which follows, upon the incomprehensibility of the Divine decrees? what would be the object of those of Jehovah upon the same subject? And what, above all, would be the aim of the epilogue, which nowhere describes the spiritual blessings found by Job at the bottom of the bitter cup, but tells of a restoration altogether temporal? After Elihu has spoken, the book ought to end with the declaration of Jehovah, that he has spoken well and that Eternal Wisdom has found in him a fit interpreter.

* In the article quoted above, p. 194.

4. It is this which has led Hupfeld and Knobel to think that the theory of the author, in face of the terrible problem he had set himself, is simply that of blind submission. Man, being unable to understand, must meekly resign himself. This is the position of Elihu in the second part of his discourses, and it is also the theme of those of Jehovah. We shall not certainly deny the relative truth of this solution; only we affirm that the author, while assigning it some place in the views of the believer, yet thinks he is in possession of a light superior to that dim twilight of passive resignation, to rest in which would be simply to give up the attempt to find any solution at all. Even the first part of Elihu's speech leads us to expect something more satisfying to the understanding. From the prologue and epilogue we may evidently gather a solution worthy of the name.

We may make the same answer to the explanation of M. Schlottmann, who thinks the object of the book is only to describe the moral conflict of the believer in the midst of trial. So understood, the book of Job becomes a treatise on morals, whereas it really is a theodicy. Looked at closely, it is to the conduct of God much more than to that of man, that the attention of the author is directed. The question with him is not how Job acts towards God, but why God acts in this particular manner towards this faithful servant. And if the author did not believe himself to have any ray of light with which to penetrate this abyss of darkness, and if the sum and substance of his book were but commensurate with the thought untolded in ch. xxxiv—xli., his treatise would be a failure, and the bold attempt of the author must be regarded as a noble but futile effort.

5. M. Volk has recently set forth a very original idea^d. According to him, the author of the book of Job wished to express this fundamental idea:—that man can never find consolation and peace in what comes to him only from man; he needs under trial the revelation of a God Who appears and speaks to him personally. Thus this ingenious attempt makes the whole book to consist, in some sort, in the Divine appearance described in ch. xxxviii—xli. But according to this view, the important feature of this part would be the actual fact of the appearing and speaking of Jehovah, and the contents of his long discourses would be comparatively indifferent. Now that is certainly not the author's idea. The pictures in which he unfolds the proofs of the wisdom and power of the Creator, have in his eyes a value as great as that of the appearance itself.

^d Volk Gulielmus de summa carminis Jobi sententiâ disputavit. Dorpat, 1869.

6. M. Pierre Leroux has made a powerful effort to overcome the difficulty. The poem of Job, according to his view, is the most ancient revelation of the supreme doctrine of philosophy—that of the progress of mankind. The author would contrast with this the stability of sacerdotalism. The great idea of perfectibility is set forth in these beautiful words^e:—

“Who is this that darkeneth counsel
By words without knowledge?”

Counsel, plan—everything is included in that word. Here we have the law of progress enunciated. As to hierarchical conservatism, that is represented by the three friends as well as by the monster Leviathan—that type of the theocracy—of which it is said, “His scales are his pride^f.” Pride—from this word M. Leroux concludes that the author is treating of a moral monster. He does not seem to have any idea that the poet is here describing the erect and magnificent crest which is formed by the scales on the back of the crocodile. He is blind also to the fact that the Biblical idea of a Divine plan overruling all creation and history, while it does not shut out the idea of the progress of mankind as he understands it, goes infinitely beyond it. Attaching his favourite theory to two or three words very superficially interpreted, he thus succeeds in making the book of Job a socialistic work, to be classed with the writings of Fourier. Poor Job! This is the climax of his martyrdom!

^e Job xxxviii. 2.

^f Job xli. 15.

7. Many ancient theologians have thought that the author of this book seeks for the justification of the Divine government in the promise of rewards after this life; the sufferings of the righteous here below were to find their compensation in the glories and joys of the future life, represented in the epilogue. But though it is doubtless true that once or twice in the course of the book the brilliant perspectives of the heavenly rewards shed their light over the darkness of present pain, yet it cannot be denied that it is on this earth that the epilogue places the restoration of Job's happiness, and that to spiritualise this last part of the book, so as to see in it a picture of the celestial happiness which is granted to the righteous who suffer, is to run contrary to the natural meaning of this passage, and to set oneself in opposition to the true thought of the author. How are we to see in the "fourteen thousand sheep, six thousand camels, a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she-asses" restored to Job, types of the glory to come? We must then also give up the idea of finding in ch. xlii. the key to the book.

Must we, then, after all, despair of a solution? That would be to forget the opening scene. It is there, in fact, that the solution is found. And it is difficult to conceive how anything so clearly expressed should have been so obstinately misunderstood.

As we have seen, the attacks of Satan are aimed primarily at the honour of God. And he knows perfectly well that the most telling blow he can inflict upon it is, to deny that God is ever disinterestedly served and sincerely loved by any being whatsoever. The object of the trial of Job is precisely to demonstrate to him the contrary. Here is the key to the mystery. And it is clearly given in the prologue; we need not look for any other. The remainder of the book can neither add nor take away from its clearness, and can only serve one purpose,—to remove the false ideas, the dangerous misconceptions, the rash judgments passed upon the Divine government, which may spring up in the minds of men when they have to witness facts of this kind without possessing the key to the mystery of them.

The author of the book does not by any means take upon himself to deny the portion of truth contained in the argument of Job's friends. Assuredly there is a close connection between sin and suffering, and the latter is often the wages of the former. Much less does he think of rejecting the explanation offered by Elihu in the first part of his discourse, viz., that suffering is, even for the righteous, a salutary discipline which serves to purify him from inward stains, known only to God, and above all to preserve him from pride. Only he establishes the fact that there are some cases to which neither of these solutions apply. Deduct all the sufferings which have the character either of just chastisement or of instruments of education, there still remain in human life a certain number which belong to a third category. This is what the author felt called upon to bring clearly into notice; and with good reason. For to widen, on this point, the narrow horizon of our natural thoughts, is the only means of completely rooting out that unfair prejudice which leads us instinctively to make of every afflicted being an object of suspicion, or one whose case is settled, and to calculate the degree of his guilt by the amount of his suffering. If we did but apply this method of judging to ourselves, the danger would perhaps not be great. But, urged by a secret malignity, and by a perverted feeling of justice, we find a pleasure in dissecting the conduct of our neighbour in order to discover in it the cause of his misfortunes. Our sympathy hardens itself against him just at the very moment when he has most need of it in all its fulness; and instead of lifting him up by the force of love, we complete his misery by the cruel suspicions which arise in our minds, and which he perceives even through the silence in which we wrap them. To break through that iron band by which our compassion is stifled, and to labour at rooting out from the earth the odious race of vexatious comforters, is the special object of that part of the book which follows immediately upon the prologue,—the conversations of the suffering hero with his three pretended friends. But in order completely to break the link of connection which our minds are inclined to form between suffering and sin, would it be enough to add, as Elihu does, to the class of punitive chastisements, that of purifying sufferings? This distinction is no doubt an important one, and it is profoundly true. But it still leaves in existence the fatal principle—so much pain for so much sin in each individual. For if on the one hand punishment is proportioned to guilt, so on the other must the means of purification be to the amount of defilement to be removed. He, then, who is the most tried must be considered also as the greatest sinner, in intention if not in fact, in inward disposition if not in actual conduct. And the fatal epithet, deserved, still attaches, do what one will, to the word misfortune. It is absolutely necessary to find an outlet from this prison, in which charity is stifled; and the book of Job is there in the Bible to provide it for us.

There are cases in which God inflicts suffering upon man, not on account of sins committed which need expiation, nor yet in view of his moral character needing improvement, and of faults into which he might fall which need to be prevented, but for His own sake, and for the vindication of His own honour. It is then given to man to play a noble part in the universe,—that of avenging the outraged honour of his Creator, and of making His glory shine forth even into spheres above that of humanity. The weakly child, about to quit this life after having known nothing of it but its pains; the mother, confined to her bed of suffering for twenty years, deprived of the happiness of bringing up her young family herself; the honest and hard-working father, who feels his strength giving way under the influence of some incurable disease, and that at the very moment when his labour was most necessary for his children; the upright merchant who, because he would not consent to some base act, sees himself and his family exposed to the shame of bankruptcy, and to all the privations of poverty—they will, no doubt, in the first place, take account of their own ways, and probe their own hearts; they will humble themselves, if there is cause, at the memories of the past and at the sight of the stains they find in their own hearts. But if, after all this, they still find in their misfortunes something that cannot be explained, let them guard against being led, as Job was at times, into doubting the wisdom and the justice of God, and let them say to themselves, “God wills to give me, a sinner, an opportunity of shewing that I love Him for Himself, not for the good things which He has given me to enjoy—that I love Him notwithstanding all the trials with which He overwhelms me. To suffer gladly for His sake is the worship I now offer Him. Perhaps, at this moment, my pains meekly borne, may be a sacrifice whose sweet-smelling savour shall rise to the Heaven of heavens, and God is about to obtain, through me—worm of the earth, fit only to be trodden under His foot—a glorious victory over His enemy and mine.” To consent to play this part is the highest act of man—heroism in its holiest form; to enact it as Job did, is to realise the highest destiny of the creature such as is described in Ps. viii., that admirable picture of the greatness of man, and particularly ver. 2:— “Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings

Hast thou ordained strength because of thine adversaries;

That thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger.”

This thought was one of those which used to sustain the Apostles in their painful career: “God hath set forth us the Apostles last,” says St. Paul, “as it were appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men.” The theme of the book of Job, from this point of view, was, as it were, formally stated by Jesus Himself in the answer which He made to the question of His disciples on the reason of the blindness of the man born blind.

“Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him ^b.”

With the two former explanations of suffering (punishment and trial) “one can indeed,” said an invalid,

^c 1 Cor. iv. 9.

^b John ix. 3.

shattered by pains both of body and soul, "reach submission and peace; but one needs the third to rise to joy."

I know well that this highest consolation is not within the reach of all men, nor of any man at all times. As it was not accessible to Job so long as the secret of heaven was not revealed to him, and he had to win the victory in total darkness, without the help of the light of God; so does the want of light or of faith deprive many a sufferer of that illumination, even with the help of the Holy Scriptures and the reading of the book of Job. This gleam of light upon the Divine decrees is ever veiling itself afresh in the spirit of man—for hours in the history of any one individual, for centuries in that of mankind—as if it had never been offered to us. The position of the believer under trial becomes then exactly like that of Job, who was in ignorance of all. It is for these times of darkness that the last discourses of Elihu, and those of Jehovah, upon the absolute submission due from short-sighted man, in every condition of things, to the dispensations of the Most High, were written. To him who cannot understand, there offers itself, even in this very ignorance, a sublime mission, that of drinking the bitter cup solely because of the Hand which offers it. "God shews Himself everywhere to be the wisest and the most powerful of beings. He must be also consequently the best. That is enough for me. I have searched for the accursed thing in my tent, I have put it far from me; I no longer can discern the reason why He keeps me in His crucible, and even heats it more and more intensely. But what signifies it to me? He it is Who kindles the furnace. With this thought I embrace my cross, with all that it contains of mysterious and inexplicable; and with this precious burden I throw myself, with closed eyes, into the arms of God, Whose Name, imprinted upon all His works, is Wisdom." This is the path sketched out by Elihu and by Jehovah Himself; it is the way of simple faith. Even the brilliant light which shines in the prologue has not rendered this superfluous.

But the epilogue? Does not this final and altogether earthly triumph of Job bring us back to the idea which the author has been endeavouring to combat—that of earthly retribution assured to the righteous? No. The prologue was, as it were, an appeal to human love which had been under unworthy suspicions. The epilogue is the manifestation of Divine love which had been momentarily hidden.

The theism of revelation rests upon one fact—the love of God for man; and aims at one fact—the love of man for God. In the relation to one another of two living creatures who love each other tenderly, do we not see how every grief suffered by one in presence of the other strengthens the link of affection which unites them, and calls forth a still more lively manifestation of it? And does not every new act of devotion make the flame of satisfied and even grateful love, on the part of the being so faithfully loved, break forth into view? It is no question of so much salary for so much service—payment of what has been earned; it is a necessary moral consequence.

It is as when a river, stopped for a minute by some unexpected obstruction, resumes its course with additional strength. It is love called forth by love exhibited, and answering to it with eagerness. “So the Lord blessed (not rewarded) the latter end of Job more than the beginning.” The restoration of Job does not then rest upon any servile notion of works of merit, but upon the value which love sets upon love. Love appreciates love above all things,—loves essentially only it. If God is Love, and if, being such, He has willed to be loved, how should He not in His turn, having found what He seeks, manifest Himself emphatically as the loving God? Were He to act otherwise, His creature would be better than Himself.

As for the gods of the heathen, the heroes in whose persons they glorified themselves were but instruments. After using them they destroyed them. The God of the Bible cares for the love which He receives; for this love of His creatures is the noblest of His claims to glory. It is His will, then, that in advancing His honour, we should at the same time gain honour for ourselves, and that in serving Him we should also serve ourselves. He who in former days commanded His people in harvest-time not to muzzle the ox which in the time of heavy labour had faithfully toiled at the plough, would not fail, in His own day of triumph, to set the crown upon the head of the man who had suffered in winning the victory for Him. A charge of *Eudemonism*¹ has been brought against the epilogue. If this conclusion were wanting, the whole book would be open to the charge of fatalism. Man would then be nothing more than an instrument in God's hand. God could not thus degrade His faithful and loving servant. In making God his end, man rises to the dignity of being himself an end. The honour which he gains for God is reflected upon himself, and becomes his own glory. This result is in harmony with the first principle of Scriptural theism,—free love, in God and in man.

Should any one insist further, and say that the author should have placed this final restoration in Heaven, we shall answer that the author of the book of Job could not go beyond the limits of the revelations which had been granted up to his time. No doubt such a fact as the translation of Enoch contained some hints of a happy immortality; and some words, such as those in Gen. xxv. 8, 9, "And Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, and was gathered to his people. And his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him,"—by distinguishing definitely between the gathering of the patriarch to his fathers and his burial¹, implied even then the doctrine of immortality. But it is none the less true that revelation had not as yet cast its light upon the life beyond the grave. The theocratic promises related rather to the future kingdom of God upon earth than to the state of the individual after death. And that is the reason why the author of the book of Job, while putting into the mouth of his hero, at the moment when he reaches the culminating point of his faith, the affirmation of the future life—to meet the case of his Redeemer not manifesting Himself in this life—does not feel justified in making this hope an essential element in the solution of the problem he has set himself. He feels himself bound to solve the riddle without overpassing the limits of revelations that had been received; for he does not write as a philosopher. Clear then as it is that the restoration described in the epilogue could not be omitted in this book without inflicting, by the omission, the most serious injury upon the moral truth of its statement of the relations between God and man; it is equally true that in the circumstances under which the author was writing, he was bound to make of this restoration a scene on earth, not in Heaven.

¹ The system which teaches that good is to be done for the sake of the enjoyment it brings.

We have placed this book in the context of circumstances in which it seems to have been composed; we have brought into light the connection between its several parts, and extracted from the narratives the central idea round which they group themselves; we have formulated the problem and its solution. What is wanting, we would ask in conclusion, to this book to claim for it a place amongst those Divinely-inspired writings in which has been deposited the theocratic revelation? The problem of the sufferings of the righteous, solved by the help of a cause up to that time unknown; the false solutions of this great problem set aside; the rights of compassion vindicated; those of reverence towards God no less rigorously maintained; the consolations of faith poured into the heart of him who suffers, without his being able to explain to himself the fearful mystery which oppresses him; the ways of God justified; man exalted to the full height of his calling as the champion of God; the little history of mankind on this earth connected with, and, as it were, encased in the drama of the great history of the universe; the ideal Job, the Cross-bearer, prefigured in a historical type—full of infirmities no doubt, just because he was only a type, but through whose weakness there already shines something of Divine virtue; our earth—like that little peninsula in which of late the armies of Europe met—playing the part of a battle-ground, in which the greatest of all questions is being fought out, that of the honour of God; Satan put to silence; God victorious; man, the free instrument of His victory, exalted and glorified with Him;—where shall we find a grander conception, a holier wisdom? Could our own century have done better? Could M. Renan have discovered in his cold and stoical doctrine of duty, any more healing balm to pour into the wounds of faithfulness suffering? And it is from a period of ten centuries before Christ that these pages date! Written at the time of the siege of Troy, their in-seems scarcely dry even in our day. Is it that the tears of suffering generations have ceaselessly watered these lines? No, it is because they are instinct with a thought, Divine and therefore eternal. This is the reason of their enduring freshness. It is not possible that mankind should ever cease to make the book of Job its confidant and counsellor in sorrow, till the time when it shall reach the epilogue of its own history.

THE SONG OF SONGS.

WISDOM, among the Israelites, developed herself, as we have before remarked, in quite another direction from the philosophy of the Greeks. She did not give herself up to speculations upon the origin and nature of things. One word, resplendent with light, lying at the foundation of all the Jewish conceptions, set their minds at rest upon these matters: In the beginning God created. Hence the greater minds among the Jews directed their thoughts to the problems of practical life. The result of these labours is given us in five books, which form, as it were, the code of the Hebrew wisdom. The subjects treated in them relate, not to the study of Being, but to the purely practical question of right living; they even exhaust it. These books are—Job, in which is revealed the art of suffering well; the Psalms, which give us a model of true prayer; Proverbs, in which is taught the art of acting rightly in all circumstances; Ecclesiastes, which treats of the right manner of enjoying the good things granted to man here below; and finally, in the Song of Songs, the wisdom of the Israelites rises to the contemplation of the supreme art—that of true and pure love. What would the wisest of the Greeks have said,—he who had himself, in opposition to all the pretended wise men of his age, made the art of right living the object of his researches—could he but have meditated upon the contents of this five-fold volume? Would he not have exclaimed, like one of his own countrymen, Eureka!

Among these five didactic books of the Old Testament, there are two connected with each other by profound affinities; the book of Job and the Song of Songs. Loving and suffering are emotions always closely allied. Is it not the very secret of suffering much to love much, and is it not by suffering more that love grows? It is not by accident that the series of the five books of the Hebrew wisdom opens with the book of Job and closes with the Song of Songs. Job is the personification of faith contending with the attacks of suffering; the Shulamite, of faith contending with the seductions of pleasure. One of these conflicts is the complement of the other. Love can only shew itself to be invincible when it has undergone and overcome both.

Would we contemplate them both in their full intensity? Let us then transport ourselves, following the footsteps of Jesus, first into the wilderness, and then to Gethsemane. For those are the two battle-fields where the Christ was attacked by the illusions of pleasure, and overwhelmed by the terrors of pain. In the latter we recognise in Him the true Job, overcoming pain by resignation, even without comprehending the mystery of the sufferings to which He is subjected. In the former we shall see the perfect realisation of that ideal of faithful love which is presented by the Shulamite, the young Israelitish heroine.

I.

Three principal systems of interpretation have hitherto been applied to the Song of Songs. The common feature of the two first is that they see in King Solomon and in the shepherd beloved of the Shulamite, one and the same person. But the two systems differ in this, that, according to one of them—the only one generally admitted in the synagogue and in the Church—the love which unites the Shulamite to this personage is of a purely spiritual nature; whilst, according to the other, all that is said of the relation between these two is to be taken literally, and is a picture exclusively of earthly love. From the former point of view, the Canticle is an allegorical description of the anguish and the emotions attending the union of Jehovah either with Israel, or with the Church, or with each individual soul. According to the second interpretation, it is the picture of an earthly and sensual love, which would render the book unworthy of a place in the Canon; or at least that of a love, natural indeed but honourable and ideally pure, before marriage, up to ch. iii. 5; in marriage, after ch. iii. 6. Delitzsch is undoubtedly the writer who has best succeeded in interpreting the Song of Songs from this latter point of view^a. According to him, the idea of the Canticle is none other than that of the essential oneness of the marriage bond,—true love as the moral basis of monogamy. It is the unfolding of the meaning of that saying in Genesis: one man and one woman; and an anticipation of the teaching of Jesus, who made of these words the first article of the Christian code of family life. It is the condemnation of polygamy, which was allowed in the East, and even among the Jews from the time of the patriarchs. The whole meaning of the Canticle would be summed up in that form of address, my only one, in which the well-beloved salutes the Shulamite. And it is by going to the bottom of this idea, and not by following the false track of allegory, that exegesis should discover in the Canticle the depths of mystical love. For what the husband is to the wife as her head, that Christ is to the Church^b.

We do not think that, either in the one shape or the other, the interpretation which makes of Solomon and the shepherd one and the same person can hold its ground against the objections which are urged against it. In order not too much to forestal the future stages of our argument, we shall quote only one passage, but one which seems to us conclusive, because being placed at the end of the drama, like the moral at the end of a fable, it ought better than any other to sum up the meaning of the whole. The Shulamite, leaning upon the arm of her beloved, exclaims:—

^a Das hohe Lied, 1851.

^b 1 Cor. xi. 8.

“Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it; if a man would give all the substance of his house for love it would utterly be condemned ^c.”

Can one fail to recognise in these words an allusion to the magnificent offers made by Solomon to the Shulamite in the course of the poem? Is not this evidently shewn to be the meaning, by the declaration which follows, in which she contrasts the trial she has herself just undergone, with that which is one day to come upon her younger sister?—

“I am a wall, and my breasts like towers; then was I in his eyes as one that found favour ^d.”

Who was this he of whom the Shulamite here speaks? The words which follow point him out:—

“Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon.”

There had then really been a quarrel between the Shulamite and Solomon. The firmness of the young maiden had at last found favour with the king, and she was allowed to return in peace to her home. And now we see her as she comes forth from this formidable trial, celebrating the invincible power of true love; of that which is a flame, an inspiration of Jehovah ^e, and its victory over all those external means of seduction which a rich and powerful man can bring into play, to overcome attractions of a purer and nobler nature. Had we no other proof of the distinction between these two personages, this would be sufficient. The shepherd is the beloved; Solomon his rival; and the unconquerable faithfulness of the Shulamite represents the victory of pure love over every bond of union of which the spring is egoism.

^c viii. 7.

^d ver. 10.

^e var. 6.

We turn then now to the second principal class of interpretations—that which distinguishes and even contrasts Solomon and the beloved. The first author who opened the path to this exegesis was Jacobi (1771). It is the learned and ingenious Ewald who has since followed it out in the happiest and most consistent manner. Under his influence this method of exposition has acclimatised itself in France. M. Renan has completely adopted it in his work upon the Canticle (1860); M. Réville has also reproduced its essential features^f. Unfortunately, M. Renan has introduced into the work of Ewald some alterations which have not improved it. He has, in some sort, materialised a series of pictures in which the German divine had had the good taste to see only simple dreams or visions of the Shulamite. According to the French writer, the shepherd appears often in the course of the story. Even in the very presence of Solomon, and in the midst of his seraglio, he makes the two lovers express their mutual love. From the tower of the harem the Shulamite addresses her beloved and sends kisses to him. Notwithstanding her captivity in the palace, she has full liberty to convey herself and her friend to the garden where they for the first time swore each other eternal love, there to sport freely with him. Then the next moment she finds herself in her royal prison, sighing at her separation from him. How are we to explain dramatic monstrosities such as these? M. Renan is himself, it is true, shocked at them, but he entrenches himself behind the idea of the imperfect character of the scenic arrangements in use at that remote period. But we ask whether the ancient stage ever did violence to common sense? There are some primary laws which not even the commonest theatre could transgress without self-annihilation. To make of an oriental despot a calm spectator of caresses exchanged between his favourite and his rival, to transform a seraglio into a room open to all comers, to make the actors of the interior of the harem pass thence to the garden, called the vineyard,—such proceedings pass all licences which ancient art could ever have allowed itself, even among the Hebrews. The truth is, that M. Renan has followed an entirely wrong track. Ewald maintains with reason that the beloved does not appear once upon the scene during the whole course of the trial—any more than Jehovah does in the book of Job—until the moment preceding the conclusion. It is this absence which constitutes the very strength and reality of the trial of the young maiden. And it is not until this trial is happily at an end, when the Shulamite has won the victory by herself, that the beloved at length makes his appearance, at the moment in which the heroine comes forward leaning upon his arm^s.

Starting from the false point of view which we have just set aside, M. Renan has represented the Canticle as a kind of libretto intended to be performed with action and music at family fêtes, and especially at marriages. This opinion is akin to that of Bossuet, who looked upon it as a dramatic entertainment divided into seven parts, of which one was to be performed on each of the seven days of the feast at the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter. Only M. Renan thinks that the tendency of the book is hostile to this prince, and that this literary work was composed by a poet of the northern kingdom, after the schism which separated that state from the house of David, and with the object of stigmatising the licentious way of living inaugurated by Solomon in Judea. This poem would thus have served as a marriage entertainment in this kingdom up to the time of the ruin of the tribe of Ephraim. Jeremiah, he thinks, alludes to it in the words: "The voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride shall no more be heard." As if it were not in Jerusalem and in Judea that this prophet wrote, and that a century and a-half after the destruction of the kingdom of Ephraim! And as if these words were not perfectly intelligible without this hypothetical allusion! Besides, is it conceivable that the Jewish Rabbis, to whom we owe the formation of the Canon, should have admitted into this sacred collection, a poem written with such a purpose, supposing that they could have been ignorant of its true meaning after it had served during centuries as a popular entertainment in one whole section of the Jewish nation? Would they then have been unfortunate enough to indicate in the title of the book as its author—"the Song of Songs, which is Solomon's"—the very personage whom it was intended to stigmatise? Habent sua fata libelli. "Literary fortune has her caprices." But that would have been the strangest trick she ever played to any author or work that ever existed.

From M. Renan we must then return to Ewald; for it is in his view that we find that mode of interpretation of which we are speaking applied in the most attractive way.

The Shulamite, a youthful maiden of Shunem, (or Shulem,) of perfect beauty, finds herself a captive in the house of Solomon. He met with her during an excursion which he made with his court, and had her taken to his palace. But she resists all his flatteries and all his promises,—even the offer of sharing his throne; and having exhausted upon her all the arts of seduction, and been unable to succeed in overcoming her noble resistance and her incorruptible faithfulness to the beloved one whom her heart has chosen, he at last sends her back free to her own people. Such is the simple result drawn out by Ewald with great skill from the luxuriant pictures of our poem. This is the slender canvas which carries all this rich and gorgeous embroidery.

Starting from this idea, Ewald dissects admirably the dialogue, and then the scenes and acts of the poem; and he shews clearly the dramatic character of the work. Only, as we have before pointed out, in many of those pictures of which M. Renan wrongly makes scenes of real life, Ewald sees only dreams and visions of the Shulamite, in conformity with a well-known usage in oriental poetry, attested by M. Renan himself, and which consists in identifying the vision of the beloved with his real self^h. The Shulamite describes in appropriate terms these ecstasies, into which she falls many times, and it would seem periodically, in this remarkable expressionⁱ:—

“I sleep, but my heart waketh.”

And this expression is explained by this other, which forms, as it were, the burden of the poem, and which indicates the moment when the Shulamite falls, or throws herself again into these states of ecstasy^k:—

“I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up nor awake my love, till he please.”

In this way, all the dramatic improbabilities and ^h M. Renan, speaking of ver. 2, says, “The vision of the beloved is in all that follows identified with the beloved himself, according to a figure, well-known to the Arabian poets, called Thaif al Khaṣāl. See Journal Asiatique, April, 1888, No. 378, and those which follow.”

ⁱ v. 2.

^k ii. 7.

all the moral incongruities which would result from M. Renan's realistic interpretation of certain scenes, disappear.

The position, then, according to Ewald, is this: On the one hand, a king in all the splendour of his glory, transported with admiration, overflowing with passion; on the other, the poor and simple shepherd to whom the Shulamite has plighted her faith; the former present, the latter absent; the maiden called to decide freely between these two rivals. Such is the conflict in all its moral grandeur. If it were not for the complete absence of the beloved, it would not be the ideal trial of faithfulness.

As to the external side of the picture, we have no objection to make—taking it, at least, as a whole—to Ewald's interpretation, and if we are unable to adopt it as it is, it is not that we deem it false in any essential particular, but only that it seems to us incomplete. It starts from the right point, but it does not lead to the end which has to be reached. It is like a still shapeless chrysalis, out of which is hereafter to come forth a brilliant butterfly.

I appeal, in the first place, to the last speech which the poet puts into the mouth of the Shulamite, at the moment in which she finds her friend once more under the shades of the maternal home, and when he invites her to sing¹:—

“Thou that dwellest in the gardens, the companions hearken unto thy voice, cause me to hear it.”

What does the Shulamite answer?

“Make haste my beloved, and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart, upon the mountains of spices.”

Can that be the last word of a romance of love? When separated from him the Shulamite said to him, Come! And now when they are re-united, the burden of her song is Flee^m! And at the sound of this mysterious farewell, the form of the beloved disappears. “What,” we would ask in the language of the daughters of Jerusalem, “is thy beloved more than another beloved?” Such a conclusion must necessarily embarrass not Ewald only, but all other interpreters who refuse to see in the Canticle anything more than the praise of purely earthly love. M. Réville gets out of the difficulty with that ease which is peculiar to him. He translates simply, Come, instead of Flee. Probably he reasons thus,—to return is to go, to flee is to go; therefore, since two things both equal to a third, are equal to one another, to return is to flee. M. Renan turns the flank of the difficulty by throwing himself into sentimental comedy. This song, he says, is a piece of coquetry on the part of the Shulamite, a playful revenge for the malicious disappearance of the beloved on a former occasion. What a conclusion, not to say what a fall, after so serious a conflict, and one which has demanded of the Shulamite all the powers of her moral being! Ewald, pace the French theologian, here again carries off the palm of good taste. According to him, the Shulamite repeats with delicacy—in a modified form no doubt—the love-song in which she had lately invoked her beloved during the time of their separation: “turn my beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart, upon the mountains of division^a,” she had said to him. This song she now repeats, only substituting “flee” for “return.” But what is the object or meaning of this modification? we ask Ewald. Is it merely a piece of sauciness? Such a conclusion would be unworthy of the serious meaning which Ewald himself attributes to the whole poem.

^m [See French Bible; Tr.]

In respect of these last words, our modern interpreters are like a defeated hunter. Like the roe or the young hart, the Canticle itself has escaped from them. They seek its track upon the ground, when it is already far above them, and out of their somewhat profane reach. Now when any one finds he does not understand the last word of a book, he ought to acknowledge that he has misunderstood the first.

The very power of the breath of inspiration which fills the pages of this book, so unique in its kind, might suffice to make it clear that its meaning could not be limited to the mere love-story which forms its plot. We are far from wishing to deny the reality of the adventure so forcibly brought out by Ewald. We believe that this learned writer has, in so doing, rendered a permanent and decisive service to the right interpretation of the Canticle. But how can we fail to see that the splendour of an ideal of a higher nature, illumines all these figures, and crowns them with a heavenly glory? Hence the incomparable force of the poetic inspiration of the Canticle. The mystical interpretation has erred, no doubt, in giving no historical basis to its composition; but the grossly realistic explanations of the modern school err no less certainly in not recognising in the situation, and in the historical personages, symbols of the sublime theocratic ideas the contemplation of which inspires the mind of the author, and gives to his work that superior brilliancy which distinguishes it from all merely erotic productions. Here, as well as in the book of Job, the real drama with which the author's mind is filled, is that which is acted behind the curtain; it is left for the reader to guess it. Ewald has done much in pointing out in the Canticle a progressive action, a conflict which takes place and which leads up to a definite end. In our opinion we must go one step further; we must recognise in this history a parable; in this visible drama which unfolds itself before us, a riddle to which the reader is called upon to find the answer.

^a ii. 17.

It is not without reason that I here use this word riddle. The Canticle is, indeed, if I am not mistaken, a riddle, not only on account of the difficulties it has presented in all times to those who have tried to interpret it, but also from its very nature, and the intention which has governed its composition.

There was a time when enigmatical works seem to have held the highest rank in literature. During the reign of David—the man of war and suffering—men wrote psalms; that which inspired poetry was prayer in time of distress, thanksgiving after deliverance. In the time of Solomon—the king of peace—when nothing disturbed the serenity of the heart or mind, men meditated, observed, contemplated, invented, at their leisure; free play was given to the working of the intellect, which was carried to the length even of works of sport and fancy. That is often the case in times when, after great crises which have stirred the depths of man's soul and spirit, society again resumes its repose, and the individual man his labours and his studies. Men then live less with God, more with one another; they pray less, they talk more.

When the Queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem to see the magnificence of Solomon and to learn lessons from his wisdom, she pleased herself especially in “proving him with hard questions,” (chidoth, which properly means enigmas), and Solomon, it is said, answered them all, “there was not anything hid from the king, which he told her not.”

What are the Proverbs themselves, those short sayings, of which, according to 1 Kings iv. 32, Solomon composed three thousand? The larger part of these sayings are intended to point out analogies between some fact in the physical world and a corresponding phenomenon in the moral world. The physical fact is placed first:—

“As cold waters to a thirsty soul. . . .”

The reader is to understand at once that this is an image of some analogous moral truth, which he is invited to find out. After this first verse we ought therefore to imagine a pause, which it might be well to indicate by a row of dots. Then after the curiosity of the reader has been in this way awakened, and the activity of his mind called into play, the solution is given in the following verse:—

“So is good news from a far country.”

In this manner we may explain a number of proverbs which take the form of distichs:—

“A jewel of gold in a swine’s snout. . . .
A fair woman without discretion.”

“Iron sharpeneth iron. . . .
An angry man sharpeneth his friend.”

“An apple of gold in a picture of silver,
A word fitly spoken.”

This enigmatical form re-appears also in proverbs of quite a different sort:—

“There be three things which are too wonderful for me, yea four. . . .”

These were, properly speaking, riddles of which ¶ No translation brings out better than that of Perret Gentil the effect to be produced in this respect by a proverb.

the solution was left for a moment to the penetration of the person addressed, even when it is given in the book immediately afterwards. Accordingly, the author of the book of Proverbs opens this collection by inviting the reader¹—

“To understand a proverb and the interpretation, the words of the wise, and their dark sayings (chidoth).”

Solomon's special taste for this kind of composition, which prevailed no doubt for some time in his court, is declared positively by the historian Josephus. This author relates, on the testimony of Phenician narratives, that Solomon and Hiram, king of Tyre, two princes united to each other by a close bond of friendship, were in the habit of amusing themselves by sending one another riddles. A sum of money was the stake. For some time Solomon was always the conqueror, till Hiram discovered at Tyre a clever man named Abdemon, who used to solve all the problems which came from Jerusalem, and who, by the enigmas which he had the skill to compose himself, succeeded in defeating even the sagacity of Solomon². The Song of Songs has to such a degree this enigmatical character peculiar to the time of Solomon, that it concludes with four enigmas in regular form.

There is, first, that of the apple-tree³. The Shulamite in the last scene says to her friend:—

“I raised thee up under the apple-tree; there thy mother

¹ Prov. i. 6.

² Josephus, Archeology, viii. 5. 8.

³ viii. 5.

brought thee forth; there she brought thee forth that bare thee."

M. Renan, with some other interpreters, thinks he must here correct the Masoretic text, in order to put these words into the mouth of the beloved, and make him address them to the Shulamite. But this arbitrary correction is contrary to all moral probability. The shepherd believes the Shulamite to be a prisoner; it is not he therefore who goes to seek her. It is the Shulamite, when set free, who goes to seek him in the house of her mother, and finds him asleep under the apple-tree, beneath which he had first seen the light. But this matters little. The question is, What is the meaning of this mysterious passage, to which nothing leads up beforehand, and which connects itself with nothing afterwards? It is simply a riddle offered to the reader.

Then follows the dialogue relating to the little sister. Some persons not mentioned, probably brothers of the Shulamite, converse with her on the subject of their young sister:—

"We have a little sister and she hath no breasts: what shall we do for our sister in the day when she shall be spoken for? If she be a wall, we will build upon her a palace of silver: and if she be a door, we will enclose her with boards of cedar*."

The divergence of opinion amongst interpreters of the modern school with reference to this conversation is great. According to M. Renan, these brothers are unnatural men, who, in veiled language, express their intention of selling their sister into a harem. According to M. Réville, as well as Ewald, they are honest villagers, "representatives of the sentiment of family honour, based upon reflection and reasoning." M. Renan thinks that the little sister is the Shulamite herself: M. Réville that it is her youngest sister; Ewald, that it is a sister of some one of the villagers. It is clear from all these different interpretations that we have before us here a real enigma.

* viii. 8, 9.

But it is when we have passed from the enigma of the little sister to that of the two vineyards, that we enter, as M. Quinet would say, into the obscurities of Erebus. The Shulamite says:—

"Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon; he let out the vineyard unto keepers; every one for the fruit thereof was to bring a thousand pieces of silver. My vineyard, which is mine, is before me: thou, O Solomon, must have a thousand, and those that keep the fruit thereof two hundred^a."

We do not think any one can deny that we have before us here a riddle in regular form, a riddle whose interpretation is involved in that of a similar saying at the beginning of the poem:—

"My mother's children were angry with me; they made me keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept^b."

What is this vineyard of Solomon? What, above all, is that of the Shulamite? What connection is there between the two? What is signified by these thousand pieces of silver paid to Solomon by his "keepers?" What is the similar sum which the Shulamite agrees to pay him thenceforth for her own vineyard, while reserving only two hundred pieces of silver for the keepers to whom she has entrusted it? There are as many explanations as interpreters. As to M. Réville, he tacitly gives up the point of solving it, not bringing this matter of detail into view at all.

^a viii. 11, 12,

^b i. 6,

We have already spoken of the fourth enigma, that of the flight of the beloved, and shewn to what a degree it has driven all the interpreters to despair.

Would it be surprising, if a poem which concludes with four riddles, should itself be nothing more than a riddle on a grand scale? Besides the three thousand enigmatical proverbs composed by Solomon, history attributes to him a thousand and five songs. May not our "Song of Songs," be the most remarkable of all these lyrico-dramatic compositions which had their source either in the mind of the king himself, or in those of that circle of contemplative and poetical geniuses by which he was surrounded? If it be so, there would be nothing that need astonish us in the enigmatical turn which this composition has taken, in such a context of circumstances. And we shall have a clue ready to our hand for finding the answer to the riddle which we have to propose. Will this answer solve, together with the principal enigma, the four special ones at the end of the book? On the day on which such a solution is offered, the Sphinx will have no alternative left but to throw herself into the sea.

II.

Let us now pass on to the analytical study of the poem.

Ewald has divided it into acts and scenes. M. Renan has also published it in the form of a drama for the theatre. This view of the character of the Canticle appears at first sight to be opposed to the ancient idea which assigned it to the class of lyrics. The fact is that there is something both of the idyll and the drama in this poem. And this mixed character of the composition need not surprise us. Do not the choruses in the Greek tragedies and comedies still belong to the lyrical style of poetry in which the drama manifestly had its source? Lyric poetry personifies ideas[†]. From this personification, in some degree metaphorical, of the ideal, to the appearance as an actual person upon the stage on which the drama is acted, there is but one step, and this step is exactly that by which lyrical was developed into dramatic poetry. In the Canticle we catch, as it were, this process of metamorphosis in the very act. We have here still the ode and the song; we are already in presence of dialogue and action. The lyre is still sounding, but it is upon a stage. In it we see the vivacity of lyrical feeling raised into the power of dramatic creation. It is something like what was expressed by one of our critics thus: "The dramatic poet ought still to comprehend in himself the lyric poet, but in a state of subjection, and, as it were, gagged²." Melpomene and Thalia were the daughters of Euterpe, not her sisters.

[†] Let any one call to mind the Messénienne, where the poet brings upon the lyric stage which he has improvised, as three sisters,—and makes them speak as if they were three living persons,—the three battles of Arcola, the Pyramids, and Waterloo.

It appears to us that the action, in the Canticle, unfolds itself in three acts, of which the first has for its scene Solomon's palace; the second, the open place in front of the palace, then the palace itself; and the third, the garden of the Shulamite's own dwelling. The subject of the two first is the double victory gained by the young maiden in the two trials to which her fidelity is exposed; that of the third is her triumph after her victory.

The first act comprehends the part of the poem which extends to ch. iii. 5.

It is composed of four scenes, of which the first takes place between the Shulamite and the young girls of the harem, and includes the seven first verses of the poem.

The Shulamite, a young peasant-girl,—which is evident from these words, "My mother's children were angry with me; they made me keeper of the vineyards²,"—finds herself carried captive into Solomon's palace. The young girls of Jerusalem who are already there, form a kind of chorus, with whom the young maiden converses. This is a device for acquainting the reader with the situation. These young Israelites vie with each other in singing the delights of being the object of the attentions of such a prince as Solomon. In their enthusiasm they address him, although not yet present :—

“Thy love is better than wine. Because of the savour of thy good ointments thy name is as ointment poured forth, therefore do the virgins love thee. Draw me, we will run after thee ^b.”

The Shulamite interrupts this discourse. We perceive the change of speaker by the fact of the king being spoken of in the third person :—

“The king hath brought me into his chambers.”

The Shulamite awakes as out of a dream ; she begins to perceive the critical position in which she is placed. The words of the young girls have but too clearly enlightened her mind on this point.

These latter, without noticing this exclamation, which is as it were an “aside” of the Shulamite, continue singing the loves of the master they serve, but addressing the Shulamite, as if it were their mission to persuade her to respond favourably to the advances of the monarch. Seeing herself the object of their attentions, and comparing her dark skin with the fresh faces of the young city maidens, the village girl is troubled, and exclaims:—

“I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon. Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me: my mother’s children were angry with me; they made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept^c.”

The expression “my mother’s children,” is somewhat strange. She thinks, at any rate, that they are bringing her rather rudely under the maternal roof. This circumstance may be compared with vii. 1, where she is called a prince’s daughter. Her brothers have employed her in the rough work of dressing the vines. This to her is a kind of social degradation. And this first misfortune has been followed by a second. She possesses—no doubt as a heritage from her father—a vineyard, of which mention will be made again, later on, in one of the enigmas at the conclusion of the poem^d. Of this inheritance she has not taken the care she ought. But what are these misfortunes, compared with that which she now sees falling upon her? She is separated from her beloved. Her heart seeks him in these magnificent apartments, but he is elsewhere; at this hour of noon he “makes his flock to rest” in some shady spot upon the mountains. In thought she beholds him under the cypresses and cedars which border the pastures, and in the simplicity of her love and the vividness of the impression made upon her mind, she addresses him as if he could hear her, and says:—

^c i. 5, 6.

^d viii. 11, 12.

“Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions.”

She fears that if she goes to seek him upon the mountain, and is driven to enquire from others the place where he is resting, she may be taken for an immodest woman.

The young girls are amused at this outburst of tenderness, this sweet dream, by the help of which the Shulamite escapes from the dreadful reality; and as if to keep up in her this play of the imagination, they invite her, if she is simple enough to prefer the condition of life of a shepherdess to that of mistress of the brilliant monarch, to lead her little flock of goats up the slopes of the mountain:—

“If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the shepherds’ tents.”

A new scene here opens upon us. Solomon enters the apartment. He addresses the young maiden, and pays his tribute of admiration to her beauty; but his emphatic manner of speech is that of one of the great ones of the earth, who thinks it easy to dazzle a simple girl with a few gross compliments:—

“I have compared thee, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots. Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold^ε."

To his flatteries he thinks it well to add some promises, but he risks no great expense for them :—

"We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver^h."

Listening to such words, which are repulsive to her, the Shulamite becomes reserved, and, speaking to herself, declares that at the very moment when the king is so addressing her from the divan on which he is sitting, she is caring but for one thing, the love of her beloved :—

"While the king sitteth at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof. A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me; he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts. My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of En-gediⁱ."

Solomon answers :—

"Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair; thou hast doves' eyes^k."

The Shulamite, her spirit becoming more and more fired, addresses to him she loves, the echo of the praises which Solomon lavishes upon her :—

"Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, yea, pleasant^l."

She imagines herself transported already to his side :—

"Our bed is green. The beams of our house are cedar, ^ε i. 9, 10.

^h ver. 11.

ⁱ vv. 12—14.

^k ver. 15.

^l ver. 16.

and our rafters of fir. I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys^m."

This means clearly enough that she prefers the carpet of verdure and the shades of the forest to the gilded rooms in which she finds herself a prisoner. She is a flower of the field, and feels herself out of place in this magnificent palace. Solomon does not discourage her:—

"As the lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughtersⁿ."

The Shulamite, excited, answers him with an increasing vivacity:—

"As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste^o."

The vision of her beloved reaches here to its full intensity. Detaching herself entirely from the surrounding circumstances, she forgets her captivity; she fancies herself with him again in the places in which the young men and maidens used to make merry. Her heart gives way in this imagined bliss. The strong effort she has just made to resist the seductions to which she has been exposed, the fervour of her love, which has been intensified by this struggle with the passion of which she is the object, have exhausted her strength. She fancies herself falling into the arms of her beloved, in whose presence she imagines herself, and, closing her eyes, she entreats

^m i. 16, 17; ii. 1.

ⁿ ii. 2.

^o ver. 3.

the maidens who are about her, in the name of everything that is lovely and tender in rural life, to respect the bliss into which her love has thrown her, and not to recal her to the sad reality, before she awakes of herself out of this sweet, unspeakable ecstasy:—

“He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love. Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples: for I am sick of love. His left hand is under my head, and his right hand doth embrace me. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.”

Here, then, we see the Shulamite wrapped in her blissful dream. This is the point at which, properly speaking, the first act should close. But the author reveals to us the Shulamite’s visions during this state of trance. The curtain falls for a while upon the external world, but at the same moment it rises upon what is passing in her soul. The two scenes which are to follow, are two ecstasies of the young maiden, closely connected with each other, and which form the conclusion of this first act.

The first—the third scene of the poem—comprehends chap. ii. 8—17. It is a morning scene. The Shulamite is in her mother’s house. She fancies she hears the voice of her beloved calling to her, and catches sight of him through the lattice:—

“The voice of my beloved! behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills. My beloved is like a roe or a young hart: behold, he standeth behind our wall, he looketh forth at the windows, shewing himself through the lattice¹.”

He is inviting her to a walk with him into the country, which is beginning to clothe itself in its vernal beauties:—

“My beloved spake, and said unto me, Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; the fig tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell².”

But the Shulamite does not accept this invitation; she does not shew herself. The beloved likens her to a dove hiding in the clefts of the rocks. If she cannot follow him, at least he begs to see her face, to hear her voice; he asks her for a song:—

“Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away. O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely³.”

She replies by a song in which she reminds him of the commands of her brothers, which oblige her, as well as her younger sister perhaps, or other young girls, to guard the tender shoots of the vine against the depredations of the little foxes. Thus do we hear echoing on through the ecstasies of the Shulamite all the emotions, pleasing or painful, of her past state of watching:—

¹ ii. 8, 9.

² vv. 10—13.

³ vv. 13, 14.

“Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes.”

Hence she is obliged to defer until the evening the walk to which she is invited. But her heart is none the less united to her friend; and when evening comes, and she will have finished attending to her rough work, she expects to see him coming towards her with eager steps, that they may enjoy the last hour of the day together.

“My beloved is mine, and I am his: he feedeth among the lilies. Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, turn, my beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of Bether.”

Did ever any poetry surpass the dazzling brilliancy of this picture?

The second trance of the Shulamite which forms the fourth and last scene of the first act, is described in iii. 1—5.

The evening has come; the beloved has not made his appearance. Night reigns around the Shulamite, and in her heart. We must remember that the scene which follows is entirely imaginary. That which would be shocking were the Shulamite speaking and acting in this way while in full possession of her faculties, will appear but natural, if we remember that it is an ecstasy or trance which the author is describing. It is important to notice here the use of the plural, the nights^{*}, which many of our translators have wrongly changed into the singular. This use of the plural is an insuperable difficulty in the way of any interpretation coarsely realistic. Finally, in order to understand the picture which follows, we must remember the custom of the oriental shepherds, who whenever they fear any nocturnal danger, bring their flocks back into the shelter of the towns and pass the night with them in the public places. Hence we understand how it comes to pass that the Shulamite went in search of her shepherd in the solitary streets in the middle of the night:—

¹ ii. 15.

² vv. 16, 17.

“By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth :
I sought him, but I found him not. I will rise now, and go about the city in the streets, and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loveth.”

Poor Shulamite! The hard rules of law do not easily accommodate themselves to the impulsive movements of a lover's heart. She falls into the hands of the watch, but this time she escapes with only a fright; and soon finding the object of her search, she brings him into the house, into her mother's room;—a little feature in the narrative of exquisite delicacy, admirably leading the reader to contrast this scene with the picture which opened the drama,—that of the young Israelitish maidens left alone in the harem of the palace:—

“I sought him, but I found him not. The watchmen that

* iii. 1.

† vv. 1, 2.

go about the city found me: to whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? It was but a little that I passed from them, but I found him whom my soul loveth: I held him, and would not let him go, until I had brought him into my mother's house, and into the chamber of her that conceived me²."

Then the Shulamite feels herself lost once more in the ineffable bliss caused by the conscious presence of her beloved. And from the midst of this happiness, on which rest the eye and the blessing of her mother, she repeats the prayer which she has before addressed to the young maidens around her when she had felt herself falling into the trance, and once more adjures them to respect the sacred repose of love, and not to tear her violently from this blissful dream:—

"I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please³."

Nothing can be more consistent, it seems to me, than the conception of this first act, so understood.

The second song of the poem, or the second act of the drama, extends from iii. 6 to viii. 4. It is the repetition of the trial to which the Shulamite's fidelity is exposed, but in an intenser form. The scenes correspond almost exactly with those of the first act. The first represents her brought in, as it were, in triumph, upon the portable throne which Solomon has had made. She arrives at the gates of the palace, admired by the people of Jerusalem who surround the procession. She is received by the king, who introduces her into the palace. The dialogue between her and the king then begins. Solomon pours out his admiration and his passion. He hopes that even that very day the Shulamite will give herself to him. She shall be his only one in the midst of all the other queens, and all the beauties who fill his harem. She replies to all these grand offers as she had done, in the first act, to promises less magnificent. But in this violent contest between the passion of the king and her own true and sincere love, which the contact with this alien fire only kindles into greater intensity, she falls again into one of those fits of absence which are in her the introduction into the state of ecstasy; and it is with this condition of the Shulamite that this act continues and concludes. We see, then, that the second act is a repetition of the first, in larger proportions. Let us go into the details.

² iii 2—4.

³ ver. 5.

The first scene, that of the coming in of the Shulamite on Solomon's throne, is described in iii. 6—11.

The inhabitants of Jerusalem express their surprise and admiration at the sight of the procession as it approaches:—

“Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant? Behold his bed, which is Solomon's; threescore valiant men are about it, of the valiant of Israel. They all hold swords, being expert in war: every man hath his sword upon his thigh because of fear in the night. King Solomon made himself a chariot of the wood of Lebanon. He made the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the covering of it of purple, the midst thereof being paved with love, for the daughters of Jerusalem. Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold king Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart."

The first words might be perfectly rendered by the neuter: "What is that?" instead of "Who is this?" and be made to refer, not to the Shulamite herself seated on the palanquin, but to the portable throne, all enshrouded in the clouds of incense which they are burning around it. The only indication of the presence of the Shulamite is the address of Solomon^b, at the moment when the procession arrives. Nevertheless, we have translated it in the feminine on account of the parallelism between this passage and the analogous question of viii. 5: "Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness?" where there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the Hebrew pronoun.

Many interpreters make the description of the bed of Solomon^c refer not to the portable throne of which mention has just been made^d, but to the nuptial couch which he has had made in prospect of his marriage with a new queen. In this sense, this passage makes a fit introduction to the invitation addressed to each other by the young Jerusalem maidens, to come and see the grand ceremonial of the crowning of the youth-

^b iv. 1.
it is "chariot." Tr.

^c vv. 9, 10. In our English version

^d ver. 7.

ful king by his mother for the day of his espousals. We must on no account translate the words which we have thus rendered—"the midst thereof being paved with love," as M. Renan does: "in the midst shines forth a fair one, chosen from amongst the daughters of Jerusalem." We should have to do violence to the sense of the Hebrew to get this meaning out of it, which besides would have also to be set aside if only for this reason, that the Shulamite was not a daughter of Jerusalem.

What had happened between this act and the preceding one? Had Solomon, on meeting with such determined opposition from the young maiden, sent her back to her mother? Is it there that he now, for the second time, sends this magnificent procession to fetch her, hoping that the royal splendour in which she is brought back will dazzle her, and prepare the way for the victory which he still makes sure of winning? This supposition seems to us more natural than that which makes the Shulamite remain in the palace after the preceding ecstasy;—how, in the latter case, are we to account for the procession which brings her?

With chap. iv. 1 the second scene opens,—the dialogue between Solomon and the Shulamite.

"Behold, thou art fair, my love."

This is a repetition of i. 14. Then, up to ver. 6, the king enthusiastically describes her beauty. The Shulamite interrupts him as she had done before*. She hopes that when the evening is come she will be at liberty to climb the mountain of myrrh and the hill of frankincense, where her beloved feeds his flock. Solomon replies with expressions more and more impassioned. Does he allude, in the words which follow, to the Shulamite sitting on his throne in the palace, from which she casts at him glances full of pride? or is he here imitating the language of the shepherd, who, in ii. 14, had compared her to a dove which hides itself in the clefts of the rocks?

* i. 12 and 14.

“Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse, with me from Lebanon: look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions’ dens, from the mountains of the leopards¹. Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse: thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes, with one chain of thy neck.”

His passion kindles more and more. It overflows from his lips like a torrent of fire. The heart of the Shulamite gives itself up to the same emotion, but it is for another than the monarch before her. And when Solomon, in the paroxysm of his love, cries:—

“A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon,”

She answers at once, under the sway of her own passion:—

“Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits.”

¹ Solomon’s throne was surrounded with massive golden lions. 1 Kings x. 19, 20.

Solomon, in his excitement, takes courage and dares to apply to himself this outburst of love :—

“I am come into my garden, my sister, my spouse: I have gathered my myrrh with my spice.”

And as if already confident of victory, he invites the young people around him to share his joy :—

“Eat, O friends; drink, yea, drink abundantly.”

But, oh wonder! She to whom this transport is addressed, lies before him as an almost lifeless body. While he was yet speaking, his captive had escaped from his power. She has fallen again into a trance like that which had ended the first struggle. She herself tells him so in these words :—

“I sleep, but my heart waketh.”

Here opens a scene of a kind analogous to the visions described in the two corresponding scenes of the first act, but even more extraordinary.

First, from ver. 2 to 7, we have a vision which combines in itself many features of the two which precede it. It is announced in the same manner :—

“The voice of my beloved.”

He comes to seek her as he had done in the first vision, but this time it is in the night :—

“The voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled; for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.”

The Shulamite replies with an exquisite modesty:—

“I have put off my coat; how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them?”

She then relates how she had seen the hand of her beloved coming through the “hole of the door” and drawing near the latch.

Then she rose to open to him, and touching the handle of the latch she became conscious that it was dripping with myrrh—myrrh from the hand of her beloved. Then she opened the door, but he was gone—vanished. She continues:—

“My soul failed when he spake: I sought him, but I could not find him; I called him, but he gave me no answer. The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me.”

Here again we may notice a step in advance upon the corresponding ecstasy in the preceding act, where the watchmen had let her pass without molesting her.

And in this condition she addresses the Jerusalem maidens, not this time to adjure them to leave her to her happiness—for she is not now blessed with the presence of her beloved—but to entreat them, should they meet him, to tell him how she longs for him:—

“I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, if ye find my beloved, that ye tell him, that I am sick of love.”

Just as, in the first scene, the young maidens had made a sport of entering into the Shulamite's imaginative dreams, spurring on, in some sort, the travail of her soul, the chorus here interposes, and answers her in the same spirit :—

“What is thy beloved more than another beloved, O thou fairest among women? what is thy beloved more than another beloved, that thou dost so charge us?”

Thereupon the lips of the Shulamite open, and overflow. She pours forth enthusiastic praise of the beauty of him she loves, and finishes by saying :—

“This is my beloved, and this is my friend, O daughters of Jerusalem.”

The young maidens carry on this singular conversation, as one might answer a child talking in its sleep; they amuse themselves in taking parts in this drama which is being played in the mind of the Shulamite. They ask her :—

“Whither is thy beloved gone, O thou fairest among women? whither is thy beloved turned aside? that we may seek him with thee.”

If we were in the prose of actual life, the Shulamite would have to answer that she knows nothing about it, for her beloved had vanished suddenly without giving her time to see whither he was gone. But we are in the world of visions, where imagination quickly fills up all lacunæ :—

“My beloved is gone down into his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies. I am my beloved’s, and my beloved is mine: he feedeth among the lilies.”

If the preceding apparition were not a mere vision, there would be no meaning in this answer. Shepherds do not pasture their flocks in the middle of the night.

Here⁵ opens the third scene, which extends to viii. 4, and in which, if we compare it with the corresponding scene of the first act (the fourth), we may notice again a gradation not less marked relatively to this last. Solomon re-appears. He is about to make a last effort. He renews rather emphatically his flatteries, comparing the Shulamite to the two fairest cities in his kingdom, Tirzah and Jerusalem. Then, in allusion to the proud demeanour of his prisoner contrasted with the tenderness of her invocations to her absent friend, he exclaims:—

“Thou art terrible as an army with banners. Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have overcome me. . . . There are threescore queens and virgins without number. My dove, my undefiled is but one; she is the only one of her mother, she is the choice one of her that bare her. The daughters saw her, and blessed her; yea, the queens and the concubines, and they praised her. Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?”

We have already seen how, during the Shulamite's ecstasies, there returned upon her memory the impressions of her state of watching, and the outward circumstances which had produced them. She seems at this moment to be recalling some memory, and trying to picture to herself the events which have brought her to her present condition. She had gone down to her garden, which was in a retired valley, to enjoy the sight of the growth of the spring vegetation. And there, without knowing how it happened, she found herself in the midst of the chariots of a royal procession :—

“I went down into the garden of nuts to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded. Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib.”

Did this imprudence on the part of the Shulamite take place before her former captivity, or was it the cause of the triumphal but compulsory return which forms the subject of the opening of the second act ? It is difficult to decide between these two alternatives, but the general sense of the words is evident ; she reproaches herself for having allowed her curiosity to draw her too near the escort of the young king, who, with all his court, was on a party of pleasure in the neighbourhood of the place where she lived ; and she acknowledges that it was thus she brought upon herself what has now happened. The memory of this moment becomes so vivid in her mind that she tries to fly now, as she ought to have done in reality when the event occurred. Still in her state of trance, she rises and endeavours to escape. Only so, it seems to us, can we explain that invitation, so pressing and four times repeated, by the surrounding assembly :—

“Return, return, O Shulamite ; return, return, that we may look upon thee.”

The Shulamite replies with a charming modesty :—

“What will ye see in the Shulamite?”

The assembly answers :—

“As it were a dance of Mahanaim.”

This is one of the passages which have most perplexed the interpreters. Mahanaim means two armies. It is the name which the patriarch Jacob gave to the place where, on his return to Canaan, God welcomed him, in a manner, by the apparition of two hosts of angels^h. M. Renan imagines here the introduction upon the scene of a common dancing girl, one of those “bayardères” employed in the idolatrous worship of the East, endeavouring to divert the looks of the assembly from the Shulamite, and to fix them upon herself. It is she, according to him, who says: “How can you notice the Shulamite in the presence of a dance of Mahanaim?” alluding to the dance in which she herself is about to perform. M. Renan supposes that Mahanaim was a town famous for this sort of entertainment. In this case it would have been a sort of ballet brought in as an interlude in the opera of which the Canticle was the libretto. But this episode would be but a by-play in the poem. It would needlessly divert the attention of the readers from the heroine who is the centre of the action of the play. And what meaning are we then to give to this command, four times repeated, and evidently addressed to the Shulamite: "Return!" Besides, it is quite impossible to translate: "before a dance;" the text says, "as a dance." Lastly, the greatest difficulty in M. Renan's way is, how to return to the Shulamite thus abandoned? It is to the "bayardère" that the enthusiastic description which follows would have to be applied¹. And the Shulamite, to recall attention to herself, would take up the conversation again in ver. 10! Enough, and too much, of such improbabilities!

^h Gen. xxxii. 8.

M. Réville, following M. E. Meier, suggests an explanation even less defensible. These two authors translate vi. 12 as follows: "I know not how my heart led me far from the horses (Meier, the troops) of my brave people;" that is to say, according to these two authors: "far from my valiant countrymen," the brave youths of Shunem, (or Shulem), who would have been well able to defend her against Solomon's people, if she had not gone so far from her home. According to this, it is the sigh of those young villagers after their lovely compatriot who had vanished from their dances, that we are to hear in this fourfold, "Return!" addressed to the Shulamite. M. Réville himself confesses that this sudden appearance on the scene of the men of Shulem, is an event "contrary to all probability." But to justify the author, he supposes that he intended to make this an echo-scene (the four "returns")! It is most forced, at any rate, to translate "far from the horses or chariots." M. Réville seems to wish by this forced translation to make up for the transformation of "flee" into "return," in the last verse of the poem.

¹ vii. 1—2.

From our point of view, the interpretation no longer presents any difficulty. In her trance, which is a kind of somnambulism, the Shulamite, who was on the point of taking flight, begins slightly to move, in presence of the company. The effect she produces upon all who see her in this mysterious state, is that of a being hovering between heaven and earth, a supernatural apparition; and it is to this that allusion is made in that strange expression, "like a dance of Mahanaim," that is to say, of a host of angels. The chorus then begins singing the praises of her grace and beauty^k. This enthusiastic description has often been put into the mouth of the king, but the contrary is shewn by the expression in ver. 5:—

"The hair of thine head is like purple; the king is entangled in its curls^l."

What proves undeniably that it is the sight of the measured march, or, if you will, the dance of the Shulamite which charms the spectators, is that the description begins with the walk and the shoes of the Shulamite, and ascends gradually to her hair:—

"How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter."

^k vii. 1—5.

^l Eng. version, "held in the galleries." TR.

Does this title, prince's daughter, refer only to the nobleness and dignity of the whole bearing of the young maiden, or does it not also contain an allusion to her high birth?

Excited to rapture by this sight, the young king gives vent without restraint to his passion :—

“How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love, for delights ! . . Thy stature is like to a palm tree. . . I said, I will go up to the palm tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof : . . . and the roof of thy mouth is like the best wine^a. . . .”

Suddenly the Shulamite interrupts him, as she had done before in the first act, and adopting his own expression, finishes by applying it to her lover :—

“ for my beloved.”

And now, in her turn, abandoning herself to the intensity of her feeling, she opens her mouth to say things which in her waking state she would never have uttered. Her beloved is present; she is his. She invites him to an excursion into the country; then she will bring him again into her mother's house, and there she will serve him with the fruits new and old which she has been keeping for him. Oh! why is he not her brother? Then she could at any rate live with him, and shew him her love, without anybody having a right to blame her,—sit at his feet in her mother's house, and let him teach her all she does not know. Then she in her turn will offer him

^a vii. 6—9.

spiced wine and the juice of her pomegranates. . . . And at this delicious thought she feels herself again falling into a swoon, but she thinks it is in the arms of him whom she fancies close to her; and as she loses consciousness, in the ecstasy to which she resigns herself, she repeats the burthen of her song—the words which each time give notice of rest after the struggle:—

“I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, until he please.”

Thus has the faithfulness of the Shulamite triumphed in two terrible conflicts with the three great powers of which the apostle speaks; the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. She has preferred the love of a man, poor but sincere, to the passion of one selfish, however magnificent. The love of him who gives nothing—but himself, has seemed to her better than the love of him who gives everything—except himself.

The third act is the triumph which follows victory. It comprehends the last chapter, from ver. 5, and is composed of four short scenes, in which all the personages connected with the Shulamite make their appearance, as in a kind of review, each one uttering, or else listening to, words which sum up the truth of her condition.

The first of these short scenes naturally refers to the relations between the Shulamite and her beloved. The chorus see in the distance two personages approaching;—a youth with a maiden who is leaning upon him in trustfulness and tenderness:—

“Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved?”

This corresponds with the Shulamite's appearance in the preceding actⁿ, when she was arriving at the palace in Solomon's palanquin, and surrounded by his guard. Now she has regained her liberty, and has hastened to seek her friend. She has found him asleep under an apple-tree, near the paternal house. As she comes upon the scene with him, she addresses to him these words:—

“I raised thee up under the apple tree: there thy mother brought thee forth: there she brought thee forth that bare thee.”

And now that she has found him, her sole wish is to remain indissolubly united to him:—

“Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm^o: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be condemned.”

How could M. Renan bring himself to put these burning words into the mouth of a sage, of a pedant, who was to utter them on the stage like the moral of a fable? It is the Shulamite herself who is here

ⁿ iii. 6.

^o The ancients used to hang their seals to the neck, or to the wrist, by a chain.

celebrating the strength of the feeling which has made her victorious, of that true love which is as a flame proceeding from Jehovah Himself, into which no selfish element can enter, and whose unconquerable vehemence is only equalled by the power of death, and the insatiableness of the grave.

If this poem were only a love-song, it would finish with this its highest burst of feeling. We are not surprised, therefore, to find many interpreters who take this view of it, rejecting all that follows as added at a later date. But this is an arbitrary hypothesis, which finds no support from the manuscripts. We proceed, therefore, to the second scene: the Shulamite and her younger sister.

At her mother's house, the Shulamite finds herself confronted with her brothers who had educated her so sternly; and there she converses with them about a younger sister, whose age for the present protects her from a trial like that to which she has herself been just exposed. But for her, too, the hour of trial will soon come. We have already given the dialogue in which the decision arrived at in this family council is related^p. The meaning of it is this: if the young maiden keeps firm she shall be crowned, but if she gives way, shame and servitude await her. In order to develope moral energy in her young sister, the Shulamite holds out her own example; did she not, like an impregnable citadel, at last force the besieger to make peace with her?

^p p. 258 ; viii. 8-10.

Who is this besieger? If the whole poem did not make it plain, the sequel would shew it clearly enough. The Shulamite settles her account with Solomon himself. She addresses him as if he were present^a.

The king has (hajah, which properly means there has come to him) a large vineyard in a place called Baal Hamon. As to this place, of which the name means master of a multitude, it would be as useless to look for it in the map, as it would be to look for the mountain, from the top of which the Devil shewed Jesus all the kingdoms of the world. This domain is let out to tenants, and it brings the king large revenues. For each of these tenants has engaged to pay him a thousand shekels. Well, the Shulamite also has a vineyard of her own. She has not, it is true, been able to keep possession of it^r. She has lost it by her own fault, and given it to Solomon. Nevertheless, she will not take back the gift she has made. Let him also take his thousands from her vineyard, but let two hundred shekels be reserved for the "keepers" of this property. It is a sort of will. The Shulamite makes a bequest in Solomon's favour, but at the same time charges the property with a permanent rent for those whom she recognises as tenants of her vineyard in perpetuity.

Finally, the shepherd, who has just made his appearance for the first time, opens his mouth, and utters the only words attributed to him in the whole drama. He asks the Shulamite, as a favour to his friends who have come down with him from the spiced mountains, on which he has his dwelling, for a song. He addresses her as the inhabitant of the gardens. We must take care not to substitute here, as M. Renan does, the singular for the plural, and translate, "Fair one, who inhabitest this garden." He is not speaking of any garden in particular, but of gardens in general. It is the Shulamite's kind of life, as opposed to his own, which the shepherd wishes thus to define. The gardens symbolise social life and its restraints; the pasture-lands complete liberty:—

^a viii. 11, 12.

^r i. 6.

"Thou that dwellest in the gardens, the companions hearken to thy voice: cause me to hear it."

Then it is that the Shulamite, complying with the wish of her beloved, sings to him those mysterious words, which seem to indicate a secret fear, inspired, perhaps, by the thought of the presence of the mighty Solomon:—

"Flee, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices."

She gives up the thought of accompanying him herself. There is still a bond which holds her to these gardens—that lower domain of the monarch's kingdom. But there is nothing to keep him back. Let him spread his wings, and return to his natural sphere! Let him re-ascend to where he can breathe once more the pure air of perfect liberty.

And it is in face of this last verse that M. Renan has the courage, to say no more, to bring his analysis of the poem to an end with these words: "The Song concludes therefore (!) quite naturally with the peaceful re-union of the two lovers." After saying which, the critic lays down his pen, satisfied. We cannot say we envy him his satisfaction.

III.

We have now to try and discover the true meaning of this poem.

The ancient allegorical interpreters endeavoured to extract from these pictures a loftier sense than could have been intended by the author. It is not a task of that kind that we wish to undertake. For the reasons we have been setting forth, we cannot help suspecting that the poet himself has given to the strange scene we have just been analysing, and of which we have pointed out the connection, a higher sense; and it is just this idea of the author which we wish to seize, in order that we may comprehend, in all its beauty, this second masterpiece of Semitic poetry. If the allegorical meaning given by the ancients has the effect of a plant without roots, and suspended in the air; it seems to me that, on the other hand, the literal interpretation of our modern expositors is like a bud which has withered before it could bloom.

Göethe thus painted the character of ancient genius :
"Formerly the imagination was preponderatingly and almost exclusively active. The other faculties of the soul were subject to it. Now the contrary is the case. She is the servant, and she has well-nigh succumbed to this bondage. The ages of antiquity held conceptions under the form of intuitions, and through the organ of the imagination; our age elaborates them into ideas. The great notions of life were, in the eyes of the ancients, living figures—became even gods; we make them into formulae. They created; we analyse."

May we not make this aphorism, in which Göethe has so well formulated the birth of Greek mythology, give us also the key to the Song of Songs? Does not this poem offer us, in fact, under the form of living figures, the highest conceptions of the Hebrew genius? Not that we would for a moment dream of considering as merely imaginary the historical fact which forms the basis of the poem, and which Ewald has so well brought into light. The anecdote of the maiden carried off by Solomon's people, exposed in the palace to all the seductions of the king, but remaining faithful to the poor shepherd, who loves her with a pure love, this anecdote is, and will ever be in our eyes, a reality. Had it not been for this apparently insignificant fact, the Song would perhaps never have been conceived in the mind of him who composed it. But the author did not limit himself to this little adventure; it did but serve as a spur to his thought. It gave rise in his mind to new intuitions, and at last it set in vibration within him the deepest chords of the Israelitish consciousness. And giving himself up to the full play of his genius, he conceived and executed this picture in which he has given shape to the ideas which filled his soul. It was the same kind of service which the legend of Job rendered to the author of the book bearing that name.

1. First, let us endeavour to determine the significance of the principal personages.

The most transparent figure is that of the shepherd. This personage does not, as we have seen, make his appearance through the whole course of the drama, except in the trances of the Shulamite; and when in the last act he comes forward for one moment in company with her, it is only to ask her for a song, to hear her voice; then he vanishes. The dwelling-place of this mysterious being is no less ærial than himself. We must look for him amidst the gardens of balsam, the fields of lilies, and the spiced mountains. His character also is ideal as well as his dwelling-place. He has all the attributes which constitute perfection in the opinion of the Hebrews; perfect beauty¹, boundless liberty², absolute wisdom³. It is through these qualities that he eclipses in the eyes of the Shulamite even the magnificence of Solomon. So much so, that the instinct of truth has forced from M. Meier, a zealous disciple of the modern school, this remarkable confession: "The Shulamite loves in her shepherd the ideal and the prototype of her people*."

¹ v. 10-16.

² ii. 9, 17; v. 4-8.

³ viii. 2.

But if we recognise this ideal character of the shepherd, we are compelled to go one step further. The Israelite ideal is not a mere idea; it is a living, a divine being. It is Jehovah Himself, the Being whose Name signifies not only He who is, but He who shall be, Jehovah manifesting Himself in this lower world, in order to realise in it the absolute good; it is God emerging from His condition of transcendence (as Elohim, or El-Shaddai), to draw near to the world, to unite Himself ever more closely with humanity, to make His appearance at last in person, in a human form, on the scene of history. This was the living ideal of the Israelitish consciousness, which it has pursued without intermission through all its trials, and which it can never give up without self-contradiction. This is the Shulamite's beloved one. He it is who pastures His flock in the ethereal regions, above these gross realities of terrestrial existence in which His loved one is still living; He it is who descends from time to time from these heights, and in prophetic visions appears to her who has given Him her heart; taking her, as it were, by surprise; He it is who loves her with a holy and austere love, offering her nothing for the gratification of the senses, but giving Himself to her with the most entire devotion; He it is who in return for His infinite condescension, asks no more of her than the sound of her voice, the worship of the heart inspired by love.

* History of the Poetical Literature of the Hebrews, p. 241.

It may be asked why the author has borrowed all the images he had need of from rural life? If, as we shall prove is the fact, the Canticle was composed in the age of Solomon, this question of form is easy to answer. When a nation has arrived at the summit of its civilisation, the ideal existence will present itself naturally under the image of a return to rural life. There is a longing to be freed, at least in imagination, from the yoke of conventionality. It is in the composition of Bucolics, that a generation, weary of its luxuries and comforts, indemnifies itself for the loss of the simple and natural form of life. It was in the age of the Ptolemies that Theocritus flourished; in the court of Augustus that Virgil sang; in the time of Louis XIV. and Louis XV. that Deshoulières and Florian composed their pastorals. The literature of an age is as often its contrast as its portrait. Nothing, therefore, could be more natural than that, in the age of Solomon, the colours required for painting the ideal should be borrowed from pastoral life.

We are much disposed to see, with the ancient Hebrew men of learning, in these spiced mountains on which the shepherd feeds his flock, not only a symbol of the heavenly home, but even an allusion to the Temple at Jerusalem, which was its earthly figure. Led in this direction by the expressions, spices, balsam, incense, they thought of the perfume ascending day by day from the golden altar, in honour of Jehovah. Is there not in the very name Har-Mor, mountain of myrrh, an allusion to Moriah (Mor-jah)? and is there not a reference, in the meetings between the Shulamite and her beloved, morning and evening, to the offering of sacrifice and incense, and the assembly of the people in presence of Jehovah, every morning and evening?

Who would not be surprised in reading the Canticle to find no mention of the Person, or of the name of Jehovah, in the visions of a pious Israelite, such as the Shulamite? But this fact is at once explained, if we suppose the shepherd to be none other than Jehovah Himself. This Divine Lover, whom the father of Solomon had already called *his shepherd, is not mentioned in any single sentence of the Canticle, because the whole of it is full of Him; He is there as God is in the universe—everywhere, and not in any one part only.

The second, and in reality the principal personage in the poem, is the Shulamite. Are we to see in her only a young Israelitish maiden, accidentally brought upon the stage of history through the story we know, or is she not also an ideal figure, the significance of which we have to discover?

What does the name Shulamite mean? M. Renan, according to an hypothesis often accepted, derives it from Shunem, a town belonging to the tribe of Issachar. To give more probability to this derivation, this town is supposed to be the same as that to which Eusebius, in the fourth century B.C., gives the name of Shulem. Ewald has rejected this etymology, and prefers to confess his ignorance. Gesenius only accepts it for want of any other more satisfactory, and because of the article which precedes the name: the Shulamite, a reason which is far from decisive, as we shall presently see. But if there is one fact more glaring than another, is it not the connection between the name Shulamite and that of Solomon? Solomon means, the perfect, the prosperous, the peaceful. Shulamite is in some sort the feminine of this name; the perfect, the complete woman. These two names are both related to Schalom, which signifies the right condition of things, perfect prosperity. The translation peace, commonly given to this word, is only an application of this more general idea. In Hebrew, one may ask, "Is all schalom?" in war as well as in peace. The real meaning is, "is all well?" Now this word schalom is the very word used by the Shulamite when, celebrating her victory in the last act, she compares her conduct with that of Solomon. She makes of this word schalom the note of unity between her own name and that of the king. "Then," says she, "was I in his eyes as one that found schalom;" in other words, "I, the prosperous one, was in his eyes (the eyes of Solomon the prosperous one) as one that found prosperity." If the name Shulamite is symbolical, the person must be so also; and this explains the use of the article before the name: the Shulamite, that is, the perfect one. As the shepherd represents the ideal towards which the Israelitish mind aspires, the Shulamite is the symbol of that aspiration itself. We should say she represented the Israelitish instinct in its perfect state. It is therefore the idealised self of each member of the nation, of the author himself, of Solomon, supposing him to be the author. It is the reaching forth of Israel towards Jehovah, considered in itself, and independently of the individuals in whom it was more or less perfectly realised; it is the love of the covenant God personified in a being, who becomes by that very fact the ideal Israel.

* Ps. xxiii. 1.

Accordingly, in the formula which forms the burthen of the poem, the Shulamite is called simply love: "Wake not love (ahavah), until he please." This word in the Hebrew is feminine, and adapts itself better than the French to the poetical image of this sentiment personified in a young maiden.

There remains the third personage, Solomon. It is not difficult to discover what is meant by him. This grand figure, by the very splendour of his appearance in history, assumes quite naturally a representative character. Solomon is the personification of earthly kingship, as Samuel instituted it, against his own judgment, but not without the consent of the Almighty. Already, in that famous prophecy in which Nathan promises David* that "God should build him an everlasting house, and stablish his throne for ever," mention is made of his son as the representative of the whole posterity of David, in such a way that one can scarcely tell whether certain expressions apply to Solomon personally, or to the king of Israel in the abstract. Nothing can be more natural than that the author of the Canticle should take Solomon as a type of the earthly kingship granted to Israel in opposition to Jehovah, the invisible sovereign of the chosen people.

* 2 Sam. vii. 16.

Besides these three principal personages, there are some subordinate ones, the "daughters of Jerusalem," who form a kind of chorus in the drama, and the brothers of the Shulamite, or the "sons of her mother." The former represent the nation in the concrete, Israel after the flesh, fascinated by the splendour of Solomon; answering to and in contrast with the Shulamite, or Israel according to the spirit, the ideal nation. It is more difficult to explain what is meant by the brothers. We can only arrive at it by studying the action itself.

Such being the principal personages, what is the action which takes place amongst them, and forms the subject of the poem?

It appears to us (to give at the outset our own thoughts without reserve) that the true subject of the drama is the profound change wrought in the position of Israel in relation to Jehovah, by the institution of monarchy, and by the prospect of the serious dangers which in consequence of this change threatened the future of the nation.

In the dramatic representation, by the help of which the author treats this theme, we must distinguish three things: the antecedents, the trial, and the conclusion.

The antecedents are indicated by the Shulamite in slight, scarcely perceptible touches. Her brothers, being displeased with her, have thought good to employ her, a prince's daughter, to tend the vineyards^a. And further, the vineyard that belonged to herself, her own inheritance, she has not kept^b. Lastly, she has had the imprudence—and this fault is perhaps the cause of the two preceding misfortunes—to let herself be drawn by a whim of her own, into the midst of the chariots of the royal procession^c.

Enigmatical as this last passage may appear, it is perhaps the one most easy of interpretation, and may put us on the right track for discovering the meaning of the other two. Does not the author, under this image, allude to the foolish caprice which impelled Israel—the free people, the first-born of Jehovah—to become subject, in imitation of the neighbouring nations, to an earthly king? The splendour of a brilliant court, the power that attaches to a single sovereign, have led them astray. They have yielded to this impulse of fallen nature; they have been mad enough to exchange their original nobleness and primitive independence for the state of servitude to which they find themselves soon reduced.

^a vii. 1; i. 6.

^b i. 6; viii. 12.

^c vi. 11, 12; Eng. version, "chariots of Ammi-nadib."

If this be the meaning of this image, we shall easily see what is intended by the vineyard, the property of the Shulamite, which she has not kept. Interpreters who have seen in it the emblem of her beauty (Ewald), or of her innocence (M. Renan), or of her well-beloved (M. Réville), are unable to account for the parallelism set up^d between this vineyard belonging to the Shulamite, for which she pays a thousand shekels to Solomon, and that of Solomon himself, which brings him a thousand shekels from each of his tenants. But from our point of view all this becomes at once clear; the Shulamite's vineyard is simply the land of Canaan, which Israel had received as a heritage from the hand of his God and Father, and which he lost when he subjected himself and all belonging to him to an earthly sovereign. The land of Canaan is no longer the property of the people to whom God had given it, but that of the king to whom the people had surrendered themselves.

That is also the reason why the Shulamite has become the object of her brothers' indignation, and found herself called to the rough work of tending the vineyards of strangers. These brothers, who have not spared the people, are the native masters whom God gave them. First of all, Samuel, who was moved to deep indignation by the wilfulness of Israel in choosing to have an earthly king. His opposition to these acts will be at once recalled to mind, and afterwards, when he was obliged to yield, his threats: "He will take your sons and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen and will set them to ear his ground and to reap his harvest. And he will take your daughters to be confectioners, and to be cooks, and to be bakers. . . . He will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your olive-yards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants. He will take the tenth of your seed and of your vineyards. . . . He will take the tenth of your sheep, and ye shall be his servants^e." This prophecy was speedily fulfilled in the reigns of Saul and David. It was at that moment, as says Duncker, "that the patriarchal state came to an end; and if the monarchy led the nation into new paths of civilisation and progress, they had also from that time to bear the burden of a court life, such as that which already existed in Egypt, Phœnicia, Babylonia and Assyria." A system of heavy taxes and even of compulsory labours was organised. The nation became subject to taxes and levies at the mercy of the sovereign. But one of the most marked features in this change was the transformation of Israel from a nomadic and agricultural into a conquering and military nation. "Every month," says Stähelin, "24,000 men were liable to serve in turn^f." It was, in fact, no longer a question of defending the land of Canaan. All the neighbouring countries had been conquered and annexed to the Israelite empire. "David's prefects," says Duncker, "had taken the place of the ancient kings at Damascus, in Ammon, and in Edom." All these nations, now tributary, had to be kept in subjection. For that purpose garrisons had to be maintained, which demanded much military service from the people of God, who had hitherto been exempt from all such labour. What is said of David, "he put garrisons throughout all Edom^s," applies to all the other conquered territories from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean, and from Libanus to the Red Sea. Such was the system, quite new for the nation, which is indicated by these words, "My mother's children were angry with me, they made me keeper of the vineyards."

^d viii. 12.

^e 1 Sam. viii. 11-18.

^f Leben Davids, p. 46.

So not only did Israel lose her own land, but this noble nation was employed in guarding foreign territories. And in this changed condition it lost its original beauty. It is true that the mass of the people, who are represented by the daughters of Jerusalem, gave themselves up to devoted admiration of the power and luxury of the young king, who made gold as common in Jerusalem as the dust in the streets; but the true Israelitish consciousness was not thereby deceived; it had a sense of profound degradation.

Such are the antecedents. This is the moment when the trial, which is represented in the drama, begins, of which we have now to interpret the true meaning. It has, we may say, two gradations. Each time, it opens with a meeting between the Shulamite and Solomon, in which the latter exhausts all his arts of seduction; and it closes with a trance of the Shulamite, in which she seeks, or enjoys—but in the spirit only—the presence of her beloved.

The meetings between Solomon and the Shulamite represent the attraction exerted over the Israelitish mind by that ideal of earthly grandeur of which Solomon has been the most perfect historical representation, and of which he remains for ever the type. And while the chorus of the Jerusalem maidens in its absolute devotion to the wishes of the monarch, personifies the people fascinated by that ideal of outward glory which came before them in Solomon, the Shulamite by her undaunted resistance to the seductions of the monarch, and her steadfast fidelity to him to whom she has long since given her heart, stands as the symbol of that deep aspiration after Jehovah, that inextinguishable thirst for God, that divine instinct which is as indestructible in the Jewish nation as its divine origin and its Messianic destination. The honour of sharing a throne with a sovereign of the universe, with an earthly Solomon, with a representative of humanity glorified, is, in the eyes of an Israelitish consciousness, an opprobrium when compared with the holy destiny—of being the betrothed of Jehovah, and of appearing as His bride, without spot or wrinkle, at the time of His advent.

The Israelitish consciousness in its integrity had its most perfect and loftiest expression in prophecy. There is a very remarkable correspondence between the states, first of unconsciousness, then of ecstasy, which come upon the Shulamite at the close of each of her conflicts, and the manner in which Scripture pictures to us the raptures of prophecy, especially in the earliest periods of the sacred history. "I sleep," said the Shulamite, "but my heart wakes." This is just the expression of Balaam, speaking of the moment when the Spirit of God comes upon him: "He hath said which heard the words of God, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open^h." These words indicate a state of temporary insensibility to the external world, and at the same time of extraordinary clairvoyance with regard to the divine pictures presented by the Spirit to the inner sense of the prophet.

There is nothing in all this—even to the kind of somnambulist dance to which the Shulamite gives herself up—which has not its parallel in the condition of prophetic inspiration under its most ancient form. One example will suffice: "And Saul, it is said, went to Naioth in Ramah, where were Samuel and David, and the Spirit of God was upon him also . . . and he stripped off his clothes and prophesied before Samuel in like manner, and lay down naked all that day and all that night. Wherefore they say, Is Saul also among the prophetsⁱ?"

To the theophanies, or visible appearances by means ^h Numb. xxiv. 4. Evidence has been brought of the perfect knowledge possessed by the ancients of magnetic phenomena, and of the use which the priests made of them in Egypt and elsewhere.

ⁱ 1 Sam. xix. 23, 24.

of which Jehovah manifested Himself to the patriarchs, succeeded the internal and purely spiritual revelations by which He communicated with the prophets; and these ended in that grand and supreme manifestation which it was their mission to prepare, the Messianic Revelation of God, which to the externality of the theophanies adds the spirituality of the visions. For, like the former, it took place on the stage of history; and, like the latter, it should become in each believer a direct perception through the revelation of the Holy Spirit.

This, then, is what the poet would bring to the consciousness of the nation by the sight of the trial to which the Shulamite is exposed. Israel, since the setting up of the kingdom, is in a critical condition. It finds itself, like the maiden who typifies it, placed between two opposite attractions. On the one side, the regal splendour which dazzles the eyes and flatters the senses; on the other, the holy love of a God, Who, in His sublime austerity, scorns to use any sensual means for attaching His people to Himself. There, a Solomon crowned with glory and honour; here, an invisible shepherd, who appears only in visions, and in the guise of the greatest simplicity, his head wet with the dews of night. On the one side is the ideal after which the natural man aspires—the nation made glorious in the person of the king who represents it; on the other, Jehovah, deprived of all His outward splendour, retaining no attractions but those exerted by His Love, preparing for His manifestation, as Isaiah beheld Him, as the *Man of Sorrows*¹. These are the two lovers, to the power of whom Israel is subjected. Upon the willing submission of the nation to one or the other, its fate will depend. The person of the Shulamite was invented in order to pourtray to it the grave view of this state of things, and to bring it, if possible, to the choice which would be its salvation and true glory. The history of Israel—is it in its essence anything but one long struggle between the true and the false ideal of glory? And will not that great catastrophe, which will put an end for a time to its national existence, be the result solely of the false preference into which it allowed itself to be drawn? There was One who said, “I am come in My Father’s Name, and ye receive Me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive . . . for ye seek not the honour that cometh from God only¹.” Until the end, and even at this very day, the position is still the same; Solomon on the one side, Jehovah on the other; Israel between the two, called upon to make its choice.

If we are not mistaken, such is the meaning of the trial. The conclusion to which the whole leads is the arrival upon the scene of the Shulamite and her beloved, now re-united, and the solution given in a few words by the young heroine, of all the problems which have arisen out of the different relations into which Israel has entered. But these solutions are offered, in conformity with the whole character of the poem, under the form of riddles.

¹ Isa. liii.

¹ John v. 43, 44.

This shepherd, whom the Shulamite has seen in visions during her ecstasies, is now actually present. She has possession of him, and nothing—not even his disappearance once more out of her bodily sight—can any longer separate her from him. If the appearances of the beloved in the dreams of the Shulamite stand in any relation to the prophetic visions, this final arrival upon the scene can only represent the actual appearance of Jehovah upon the stage of history, His Messianic advent, the long-expected consummation of the whole series of past revelations.

But to what cause is this Messianic appearance of Jehovah due? This we learn from the first riddle,—that of the shepherd awakened under the apple-tree. The beloved was sleeping in the orchard of his mother's house, whilst the Shulamite was fighting his battles in the gilded apartments of Solomon. And it was thither, as soon as she regained her liberty, that she fled. She found him under the apple-tree where his mother had given him birth, and by her calls has awakened him.

At the period of the Wisdom of the Jews they loved to refer everything back to the cradle of the history of mankind. Wisdom herself is compared in the book of Proverbs to the tree of life^m. To the Almighty she is a beloved being whom He possessed as His companion, and with whom He conversed: "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way, before His works of old. . . . Then was I by Him as one brought up with Him, and I was daily His delight." It is through her that He has done all His works^a. She herself found her delight from the beginning in the children of men^o. Every word in this description rests upon the narrative of Genesis i. If, while reading, we bear in mind that the apple-tree is, in the oriental mythologies, the ordinary emblem of Paradise, we shall soon reach the meaning of all these images.

^m Prov. iii. 18.

It was in Paradise and in sorrow that the Messiah, the betrothed of Israel, was conceived. Was it not under the tree of the Fall, in the midst of the agonies of a deserved chastisement, that the promise was uttered, which from that time hovered like a cloud of mystic blessing over the whole history of mankind: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." That word was the beginning of the Incarnation. For a long time was He asleep beneath the tree under which He had been conceived,—the Saviour of mankind. Even after He had chosen for Himself an earthly bride in the person of the Jewish Church, He seemed during long ages not to be caring for her,—delivering up the Shulamite into slavery under the yoke of Solomon. He only appeared to her in moments of adoration and worship, in hours of prophetic ecstasy and vision. But she called upon Him: "Oh, that Thou wouldest rend the heavens, that Thou wouldest come down^p," was her constant cry through the mouth of her psalmists and prophets. This cry, "Come!"—is it not that of every uncorrupted Israelitish consciousness, the soul of that nation's life as it is to this day the soul of the life of the Church? Did not Jehovah Himself say to the watchmen who kept watch over Israel on His behalf, "Give yourselves no rest; give Me no rest^q. . ." The Shulamite is the personification of this waiting of Israel, as the Bride in the Apocalypse is that of the longing of the Church stretching out her arms towards the Christ on His return. The coming down of Jehovah, which name means, "I am, and I come^r," is the answer of this cry of Israel according to the spirit. In possession of her beloved, the Shulamite now sings of the strength of the bond which unites them to each other—Love in all its sublimity. Love is not a feeling having its origin in man; it cannot, therefore, be purchased at any price. It is a flame of Jah (Jehovah), kindled by Him, and of which the supreme object should be Himself. The passion of the rich man who offers everything without giving himself, will be treated with contempt, while the true love of the God who brings no present, but who gives Himself, has in it a power which can measure itself victoriously even against that of death and of the grave.

^a Prov. viii. 22, 30; Gen. i. 26, "Let us make man."

^o Prov. viii. 31; Gen. i. 26, 27.

^p Isa. lxiv. 1.

^q Ibid. lxii 6, 7

^r Rev. i. 4; xxii 17, 20.

After having thus explained the mystery of the coming of the beloved, and done homage to the perfection of the bond which unites her to him, the Shulamite turns to her brothers who had treated her roughly; not to complain of a severity, of the justice and good effects of which she is not unconscious, but to converse with them about a young sister whom she sees on the maternal threshold. She easily comes to an understanding with them as to the principles which should govern the training and the fate of this young girl, who is soon to follow her into the battle of life. If she is firm as a wall, she shall be crowned with battlements of silver,—glory is secured to her for a recompense. If she shews any weakness in the hour of temptation—like a door which yields to a slight pressure—she shall be “enclosed with boards of cedar,”—servitude, privation, and shame, shall be her lot. In order to add strength to this warning, the Shulamite holds herself up as an example to her young sister.

If the Shulamite represents Israel—the typical Israel—her sister not yet grown up can only represent that part of mankind which is not yet fitted to undergo the trial to which this nation was the first to be submitted,—heathen mankind therefore. The reader will perhaps ask himself whether the eyes of the ancient poet could pierce so far into the future. But does not Solomon himself, when he is inaugurating the temple, and dedicating that building to Jehovah as His dwelling-place in Israel, expressly set apart a place for the Gentiles in this house? Does he not ask that their prayers also may be heard?—

“Moreover concerning a stranger, that is not of thy people Israel, but cometh out of a far country for thy name’s sake; (for they shall hear of thy great name, and of thy strong hand, and of thy stretched out arm;) when he shall come and pray toward this house; hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for: that all people of the earth may know thy name, to fear thee, as do thy people Israel.”

Did not Solomon at the summit of his glory, see a representative of this Gentile world, a foreign queen, arrive at Jerusalem, attracted not by the fame of his name only, but also by that of the Name of Jehovah[†], whose appearance may well have contributed to awaken in the poet’s mind the idea of this personification of pagan humanity in the young sister of the Shulamite? The Gentiles will one day have to decide on their destiny. as Israel is now called to decide on its own. They, too, will have to choose between the visions of a false glory, and the happiness enjoyed in the love of God; between the Messiah crowned with gold, and the Messiah whose hair is wet with the dews of night, or even whose head is crowned with thorns!

These family arrangements being concluded, the Shulamite turns to Solomon. For she has an account to settle with him. He is not, it is true, present, but her words will none the less surely reach him.

* 1 Kings viii. 41—43.

† Ibid. x. 1, (leschem Jehovah.)

By its own fault the nation now has him for its king. It cannot undo what was done in a moment of forgetfulness. For it is with the faults of nations as with those of individuals, or of all mankind. When by a decisive act, either good or bad, a free being has admitted into his life a principle, this principle becomes a power, and it can no longer be suppressed by a simple act of the will. It has acquired the right to live, and it will not perish, if it does perish, till it has developed all that was latent in it. Man must "eat of the labour of his hands". So must it be with the institution of monarchy in Israel. The Shulamite recognises this law of the Divine justice, and it is just her determination to submit herself to it, to which she gives expression in the riddle of the vine. What, in fact, does she say in that difficult passage, viii. 11, 12?

Solomon possesses vast conquered territories. It is this which the Shulamite calls the vineyard at Baalhamon^x. For the meaning of this latter name is, master of a multitude, and designates Solomon therefore as the master not of Israel only, but of a whole multitude of nations; the Edomites, the Moabites, the Ammonites, the Syrians, the Philistines. Their lands belong to the sovereign personally, and not at all to the nation. It is he who receives all the revenues of this vast domain. In order to do so, he has established officers whose business it is to collect the tribute imposed upon each nation. This tribute is represented by the thousand shekels which the tenants of the vineyard pay the proprietor. These tenants (or keepers) represent the royal tax-gatherers in each country. We know the admirable system organised by Solomon for collecting money from the nations he had conquered. Each of them was obliged to pay annually a certain sum either in money, or in kind, according to the productions of the country. Thus the king of Moab, Mesha, was taxed at 100,000 lambs, and 100,000 rams, with their wool⁷; and other nations in like manner.

^x Ps. cxxviii. 2.

^x See p. 289.

The question now is, how will Israel act in this respect with regard to its sovereign? The land of Canaan is its patrimony. Is it to pay a rent to Solomon upon the revenue of the country which belongs to it? That would be to place itself on a level with the conquered nations. On the other hand, Israel has itself demanded a king; it was an act of folly, but it has been committed, and now it cannot free itself from the consequences of the position in which this hasty step has placed it. Here, then, is the solution which the Israelitish consciousness, personified in the Shulamite, gives to this delicate question: "my vineyard which is mine (she distinguishes by this expression between the land of Canaan which God had given her, and the conquered territories which are the private domain of the king) is before me,"—that is to say, under my eyes and not at a distance, like Solomon's vineyard in Baal-Hamon. "I have then the right to claim exemption from taxes for this country in which I live. Nevertheless I will submit to the same conditions as the other nations: I will pay the thousand." We must notice here the use of the article (ha'elep) the thousand, that is to say, the same tribute which is paid by all the other nations. Only in taking upon itself this engagement, which is the consequence of the fault into which it fell in not keeping its vineyard, Israel makes one condition; it demands that from this tribute paid to the king, there shall be deducted annually one-fifth, that is two hundred shekels; and that this sum shall be applied to the maintenance of the "keepers," to whose care the vineyard of Israel is from time to time confided.

⁷ 2 Kings iii. 4.

Who are these keepers? After what has been already said, we cannot long be in doubt; they are the priests and Levites. The priests had, up to that time, been maintained upon the tithe paid them by Israel; but now that the nation has to pay a contribution to the king's treasury, there is a danger of the priests not receiving their dues, and falling into destitution. This is why the Shulamite, while accepting the burden of the royal impost, is careful to charge upon it the maintenance, partial or entire, of the priesthood. It is well known that, at the time of the construction of the temple, the order of Priests and Levites was definitely organised. And it must have been at the same time that the question of their maintenance was also settled. And without going so far as to say with M. Duncker that a thirteenth tribe—that of the Levites—was then added to the twelve of which the nation was composed, we accept without hesitation the following words from this learned writer: “The priesthood did not receive an independent position; they were left to the assistance of the sovereign who had built the temple for them, and had much raised their position and fame.” Certainly it was not in order to favour our interpretation of the Canticle that the eminent historian wrote these lines; so much the stronger is the support they give to it.

M. Grætz, in the book he has just published on the Canticle², understands by the vineyard of Solomon his seraglio, and by that of the Shulamite her innocence, which she had been able to preserve. We say nothing of the profound disgust which must be inspired by all the images made use of if the enigma is so interpreted; we only ask what meaning it is possible, from this point of view, to give to the two hundred shekels reserved by the Shulamite for the keepers of her vineyard. “Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar’s:”—these dues of Cæsar are the thousand which Israel freely undertakes by the mouth of the Shulamite to pay its kings. “To God the things that are God’s:”—God’s share is the two hundred which are to be assigned to the maintenance of the priesthood—to say nothing of the devoted love which the whole Canticle preaches. Thus spoke the Israelitish consciousness at the time of the institution of the monarchy and of the foundation of the temple. Thus at a future day will it speak by the mouth of Him who will be no longer only its poetical personification but its living and true incarnation^a.

² Das Salomonische Hohelied.

When once we look at it from this point of view, there is no longer any difficulty in interpreting the last riddle,—that of the flight of the beloved.

The shepherd, in the only word which the poet puts into his mouth in the whole course of this drama so entirely occupied with him, asks of his beloved, one thing only,—a song from her lips. And, moreover, he asks this favour rather for his friends who surround him, and who have come down with him from the spiced mountains, than for himself. What is the meaning of this request? That on earth which rejoices the heart of Jehovah is the song which comes from the heart of His people, it is the adoration of Love. But if it is His Will that the accents of this adoration should make themselves heard, it is not for Himself, who has no need of these outward manifestations; it is for the heavenly spirits who surround Him, to whom these praises which ascend from the earth are His glory. It is men whom the angels call upon to give glory to God, even in the Highest.

What does the Shulamite answer? We know already. She sings, but it is to call upon her beloved to flee with all possible speed, to return to the mountains whence he has come down. His habitation is not to be among the gardens. He must hasten to leave the plain, even though she cannot yet follow him to the mountains where he pastures his flock amongst the lilies.

^a Matt. xvii. 25: "Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? . . . of strangers? Then are the children free. Notwithstanding . . . that take, and give unto them for me and thee."

From the time of Solomon, and during his reign, Israel may indeed have belonged in heart to Jehovah; but none the less was it externally subject to another master. The Messianic union between God and His people could not then be perfectly consummated. For that purpose it was necessary that the throne of the earthly sovereign which had wrongly interposed itself between them, should disappear. Besides, what had Jehovah already said to the Messiah by the mouth of David? "Sit thou on my right hand^b." David then himself contemplated in spirit the Messiah leaving this earth to re-ascend to God, and leaving for a time this heritage which had been given to Him in the hand of His adversaries, not to return again until, from His throne on high, He shall have brought all His rivals here below to complete obedience. The realisation of the final union between God and His people by the Messianic kingdom presupposes the complete liberation of the country over which the visible monarch is now reigning. This, if we are not mistaken, is the explanation of this flight of the beloved, in which is expressed, in the most complete and profound manner, the main idea of the Canticle: immoveable fidelity to the invisible Jehovah.

^b Ps. cx. 1; compare Matt. xxii. 48.

The Advent of the Messiah, the trial of the Gentiles succeeding to that of the Jews, the subjection of Israel to Solomon with a reservation of the rights of God, the departure of the Messiah from this earthly scene soon after His appearance on it, these are the subjects treated in these four riddles, and they exhaust all the essential conditions of the life of Israel.

IV.

How are we to account for the origin of such a work?

Two very different opinions offer themselves among the modern critics who agree in rejecting the authorship of Solomon affirmed in the title; that of M. Renan, who refers this writing to the first years of the kingdom of the ten tribes, from 975 to 923 B.C.—the time when Tirzah was the capital of this kingdom^c; and that of M. Grætz, who in the recent work which we have just quoted, places the composition of the Canticle long after the Captivity, in the time of the Grecian dominion in Palestine. He rests this date upon certain usages and certain expressions of the poem, which appear to be of Greek origin. This kind of argument is, as M. Renan shews with regard to some of these expressions supposed to be derived from the Greek, very precarious^d. Long before the time of Alexander, communications between the East and West were on such a scale that it is inconceivable that the customs and languages of the different nations should have been preserved free from all intermixture. It is safer to have recourse to criteria more directly certain. That alleged on his side by M. Renan has not, if examined closely, any conclusive force. No doubt, as this learned writer says, Tirzah could not have been mentioned as it is after the period indicated, since from that time it disappears altogether from history; but it might easily have been so before that time. For why should not a town be mentioned for its beauty, although not yet possessing the rank of a capital? And does not its very elevation to this dignity lead us naturally to imagine that it was already distinguished from others by some special advantages? So that when the early sovereigns of the Northern kingdom chose Tirzah for the capital of the new state, a dignity which it retained till the time of Omri, when it gave place to Samaria, it is probable that the reason of its selection was its superiority to all other towns in the territories of the ten tribes. That is enough to justify the words of the Canticle, which makes it, in respect of beauty, the rival of Jerusalem.

^c Cant. vi. 4, where Tirzah is mentioned as corresponding to Jerusalem.

^d pp. 109—111.

The title of the Canticle, by ascribing this work to Solomon, gives evidence of its having been composed in the time of that king. And this date seems to us confirmed by several indications that may be drawn from the book itself.

The first is that noticed by Delitzsch in these words: "The author of the Canticle moves among the circumstances of the time of Solomon with a sureness of insight which could belong only to a poet of that age. . . . The description of Solomon's palanquin and bed^a, that of the tower of David^f, the images borrowed from the tower of ivory and from that of Lebanon^g,—all reveal a writer who saw with his own eyes the life of the great king."

If our interpretation, I do not say of the details of the Canticle, but of the poem taken as a whole, has any truth in it—and it seems to me that the explanation of the riddle of the two vineyards^h hardly admits doubt on that point—the date of this work is fixed by this very fact. It is a monument of the tumult excited in the Israelitish consciousness by the establishment of the monarchy, and by the subjection of the nation and of its country to this new power. The work of Samuel, Saul, and David is evidently recent. It had at first been hailed with rapture; but after the first moments were over, men began to ponder the consequences of such a revolution, and to seek the solution of the grave problems it raised with regard to the future of the nation.

A great lyrical work, whether epic or dramatic, is always the echo of some great moral shock, the fruit of thoughts which were seriously occupying the mind of the age. The author speaks for his age, and his age speaks through him.

^a iii. 7—10.

^f iv. 4.

^g vii. 4.

^h viii. 11, 12.

Besides, could it be without strong reason that the ancient Jewish writers, men of learning, not given, especially on questions relating to the canonical Scriptures, to acting hastily, ascribed the Canticle to Solomon himself? "The Song of Songs which is Solomon's:" this title is all the more remarkable because it seems given in defiance of the contents of the poem—especially if either Ewald's interpretation or our own is the true one. Nevertheless the fact is, that if there was one Israelitish author whose circumstances fitted him to bring the great king upon the stage in the light in which he appears in this drama, it could only be this king himself. The idea of a comic or satirical play, composed in the Northern kingdom with the object of putting Solomon and his dissolute life to shame, falls to the ground, if our interpretation of the enigma of the two vineyards and of the Canticle as a whole has any truth at all in it. Certainly no citizen of the kingdom of Judah would have allowed himself to make the king play the humiliating part of an unsuccessful rival. The prophets, notwithstanding their freedom of speech, enshroud the grand figure of Solomon in a reverential silence. There remains then only one supposition. Solomon, contemplating himself at the apogee of his splendour, with a glance of that high wisdom with which he had been endowed, perceived the snare which a monarchy, such as his, would offer to the Israelitish consciousness; and taking up a position outside of and above himself, with that objectivity which is characteristic of men of the highest order of genius, he wished to set before Israel, in this enigmatical form, a picture on the one hand of their normal relations with Jehovah their invisible King, and on the other of the perilous relation in which they would thenceforth stand to the visible monarchy realised so magnificently in his own person. The form he adopts is playful, and fits the turn of mind which we have observed in this king. The material was offered him in the position of Israel at this decisive moment. The suggestion was doubtless given to his thought by the romantic adventure, of which the eye of a sagacious critic has discovered the thread, almost hidden from view amidst the rich foliage of the poem.

We know two things about Solomon's youth: one, that "the Lord loved him," and that the prophet Nathan gave him the name of Jedidiah (from Jadid, beloved, and Jah an abridged form of *Jehovah*ⁱ); the other, that "Solomon loved the Lord^k." These two expressions are quite exceptional in the Old Testament; the person to whom they were applied knew also unhappily, in a no less exceptional manner, the power of the earthly passions. No one in Israel, consequently, was more fitted than he to describe both the ardour of religious feeling, and the flames of earthly love.

It is also remarkable that Solomon twice received direct communications from Jehovah in a vision, just ⁱ 2 Sam. xii 25.

^k 1 Kings iii. 8.

as it was in her ecstatic sleep that the Shulamite twice realised the presence of her beloved.

The expressions by which Solomon in the Canticle invites his friends to share in the happiness which he promises himself: "Eat, O friends; drink, yea drink abundantly, O beloved," stand in a singular relation to the account of the state of the people of Israel under the reign of Solomon in the historical books: "Judah and Israel were many as the sand which is by the sea in multitude, eating and drinking, and making merry¹." Let us, finally, call to mind a very just observation of Delitzsch:—There is no writer of the Old Testament who manifests such subtle observation and such complete knowledge as our poet does, of all the objects of nature, whether they be minerals, plants, or animals. The comparisons he borrows from these different fields of knowledge are remarkable for accuracy, as well as variety and abundance, to an extraordinary degree. This kind of excellence was always rare in Israel. But that was precisely, and in the highest degree, the distinctive characteristic of that king of whom it is said in 1 Kings iv. 33:—

"And he spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes."

Such are some of the very strong reasons which may have led the ancient Jewish writers to give the Canticle the title they have given it.

¹ Comp. Cant. v. 1 with 1 Kings iv. 20.

But, besides, is it quite certain that the title does come from them, and was not a part of the original writing itself? Is it not the custom of the Jewish and Arabian poets to put their name at the head of their works?

There is one fact which seems to me to prove at any rate the existence and the authority of the Canticle in the time of Isaiah. It is the passage in Isa. v. 1, and following verses. This passage opens with these words: "Now will I sing to my well-beloved a song of my beloved touching his vineyard." This "vineyard," in the prophet, is Canaan, as it is in the Canticle. The well-beloved of the prophet is Jehovah, as in the poem. He is even called by the altogether exceptional name of Dodi, as He is in the Canticle. The other expression used for my beloved is Jedidi, the very word which enters into the composition of Jedidiah, Solomon's surname. Lastly, the name schir (song) is another point of likeness, all the more remarkable because we find it made use of in an unusual manner in the midst of a collection of prophecies. Do not these points of connection, which cannot be accidental, corroborate the ancient date which we attribute to the Canticle?

If this poem is the work of Solomon, what is the period of his life in which he may have composed it? It cannot have been in his early youth, for allusion is made in the Canticle to his magnificence, his luxury, his works of art, and even his seraglio. Neither can this book belong to his old age. For in that case its tone would have been that of penitence, the cry of Psalm li., "Have mercy upon me, O God!" It was rather that time of his life when there still lived in him, in all their freshness, the ineffable impressions of his youth, when his burning love for Jehovah was answered by a like love to him in Jehovah Himself, and when this Divine Friend appeared to him in visions full of sweetness and of tenderness. But already he was beginning to give himself up to earthly pleasures, even while still retaining the memory of the pure joys he had at that time tasted in communion with God. And exactly in that state in which his heart was wavering between these counter attractions, he could, better than any one, appreciate the intensity of the struggle to which Israel was about to find itself exposed, and to represent it under the vivid and dramatic form which we find in the Canticle.

It will be objected that such profound views on Israel's future, and on the Person and reign of the Messiah, were impossible in the time of Solomon. But had not David in the Psalms already opened to the Israelitish consciousness similar prospects? And, besides, no one becomes the most celebrated person of the world without possessing some exceptional gifts.

It appears to me that amongst the Scripture writers there are two who bear the clearest mark of pure Semitic blood,—with hearts on fire, full of passion, given up completely to the object of their love,— with minds altogether intuitive, equally ready to rise from the particular fact to its principle, as to concentrate the absolute into an image in which they incarnate it,—poet-philosophers, and philosopher-poets. These are Solomon and John, two kingly souls, two kindred spirits, two privileged sons of Wisdom, who, like the shepherd in the Canticle, leave an odour of myrrh upon all that their hand has touched. Gifted with such a nature, they could write the hymn to Wisdom^m, or the epic poem of the Wordⁿ.—compose a Song of Songs, or an Apocalypse.

V.

We have now only to give a brief answer to these two questions: What are we to think of the admission of the Canticle into the sacred Canon? And what use can the Church now make of this book?

If the idea of the poem is really that which we have extracted from it, it is evident that this book occupies an important and legitimate place among the records of Divine revelation. An echo of one of the profoundest of the theocratic revolutions,—a revolution in which both the sin of man and the will of God had taken part,—this book sets forth its two opposing factors; it marks out the true lines of the new situation; it warns Israel of the dangers to which that situation exposes it; it prepares it for its future. How should a poem of this kind not have a right to take its place among the writings which are the depositaries of the thought of God respecting His work on earth!

^m Prov. viii.

ⁿ St. John i.

The central idea of the Canticle having once been seized, nothing is easier than to make its application permanently available for the Christian Church. Like the Shulamite, a captive in Solomon's palace, the faithful soul, so long as she is shut up in the prison-house of the body, finds herself exposed to all the seductions of the world. But there dwells within her a sublime aspiration, an inextinguishable thirst for that God whose love she has felt, that virgin-instinct of which S. Martin speaks, which is ever urging her towards that unseen loved one from whom she is still separated by the walls of her prison. She seeks Him; she calls to Him; she knows that while all earthly creatures love her only for themselves, it is for her own sake,—purely—that He loves her. This is the lightning of Jah which has transfixed her. In the night-time she seeks Him upon her bed. During the day she exerts herself to please Him. Sometimes He comes down and manifests Himself to the eyes of her faith. She sees Him as in a dream; she delights herself spiritually with His presence;—then suddenly He vanishes. And then once more she is alone, carrying on the contest with Solomon, who draws near in all his pomp and tries to cast his spell upon her. How severe is the struggle, even at times violent! But at the very moment when the king is in his divan, the precious ointment of the Shulamite, the invisible presence of her beloved, gives forth its odour and strengthens her. She remains faithful to Him who is invisible; she sees the moment approaching in which, the true love of her God having won the victory in her heart over all the arts of the seducer, she will be fetched away by Him, and—more fortunate in this respect than the Shulamite herself—will be able to follow Him to those spiced mountains where He pastures His flock amongst the lilies.

Thus the Canticle is true even now of every place where a breath of Divine life, shut up in the earthly prison of the body and of the world, aspires after freedom, and seeks in communion with Jehovah, as manifest in Christ, its perfect satisfaction. To make this application of the Canticle is not to allegorise it arbitrarily, or to insert into the text that which is not to be found in it; it is only to let down the bucket to the bottom of the well, and bring up to the light the living water which springs in it.

Goëthe has called the Bible the book of popular education, par excellence. It is, indeed, like a case into which have been gathered all the master-pieces of literature in the smallest possible compass,—all those which appeal most strongly to the regenerate powers of man; models of each kind.

In the historical books we find a narrative, simple, naïve, impartial, objective and at the same time dramatic, living, picturesque, with which the historic writing of no nation, ancient or modern, can compare.

The prophets are samples of an eloquence at once the richest and the most chastened, the tenderest and the most austere. These master-pieces of rhetorical art have never been surpassed in the oratory of any nation, or in the pulpit-eloquence of any Church.

Lyrical art has never produced anything comparable to the Psalms. Purifying every joy, sanctifying every grief, reaching higher than ourselves when at our greatest height, deeper than ourselves when we feel plunged into the depths of the abyss, they alone fit all human conditions, and seem always to have been composed precisely with a view to the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed. Hence their everlasting freshness. Other collections of poetry pass away and give place to new ones; the Psalms live on for ever.

The book of Ruth gives us the most graceful and pure of idylls.

In the Lamentations of Jeremiah we see elegy reach an elevation from which it could thenceforward only decline.

If we look for the most popular of books of practical wisdom, we shall find it in the Proverbs.

If philosophic meditation combined with satire attract us, Ecclesiastes is at hand to give us more food for thought than any other book of similar kind.

In the book of Job is unfolded before our eyes the great epic, of which the hero is humanity itself personified in Job, and called to decide whether the victory is that of God over Satan, or of Satan over God.

The drama only was wanting. This important place seemed to remain vacant in this literary, as well as religious, code of humanity. The Canticle supplies this want. After the study we have made of this poem, may we not consider it as in many respects the very bouquet of the dramatic art, and looking at the noble character of its contents, the richness, freshness, and power of its form, ratify the name of Song of Songs, by which a place has been assigned it above all other lyrico-dramatic works—like that which poetry itself holds above prose?

So is it that God has in the Bible wedded beauty to truth, and preluded, by the existence of this book, the period when in each soul glory shall crown the sacred work of grace. “Beauty and power,” it is said, “are in His sanctuary.”

APPENDIX TO ESSAY IV.

ON THE

FOUR MONARCHIES (DAN. vii.)

AND THE

SEVENTY WEEKS OF YEARS (DAN. ix.).

I.

THE interpretation we have given of the vision of the four beasts of Daniel, has led us to look at the fourth as representing the Roman monarchy; which would pre-suppose in the author a knowledge truly prophetic. This application is rejected in modern times not only by authors of the rationalistic school, but also by such men as Delitzsch and Zöckler. The reason alleged by these latter is, that since the "little horn" in the seventh chapter, which appeared upon the fourth beast, must be the same as that in chap. viii., this latter having reference to the Grecian monarchy^a, it follows that the fourth monarchy in chap. vii. must be either the empire of Alexander, or the kingdoms which grew out of it.

Let us first enquire whether the passage in Daniel can be explained, if confined to the limits which such an interpretation would impose; and, next, whether the alleged identity between the two little horns of chaps. vii. and viii. is real.

The lion is identical with the head of gold in the vision of the image (chap. ii.), as is shewn by a comparison of the two visions with each other. And it follows from ii. 37, 38, that these two emblems refer to Nebuchadnezzar, and to the

^a viii. 21, and following.

Chaldean monarchy personified in him: "Thou, O king, art this head of gold."

The bear which "raised itself up on one side, and had three ribs in the mouth of it," corresponds to the breast and arms of silver in the statue. It is natural, then, to apply this emblem to the Persian monarchy, which superseded the Babylonian empire. But this application would make it difficult to avoid interpreting the fourth beast of the Roman empire; and an attempt has been made to get over this in two ways. Hitzig proposed to refer the emblem of the bear specially to Belshazzar, the last great Babylonish sovereign. But it is quite clear that this empire is already fully represented in the first beast, the lion. In the interpretation of the breast and arms of silver given in ii. 39, we find it said to Nebuchadnezzar,—not only: "Thou shalt have a successor inferior to thee," but "after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee." Here, then, the subject spoken of is a second monarchy, not a continuation of the first. Delitzsch and others feel this, and accordingly they apply the emblem of the bear to the Median empire, but making it distinct from the Persian. This distinction is rested upon vi. 28: "In the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian." But this distinction between the Median and Persian monarchies is a pure fiction. The former would have lasted only two years, since Darius the Mede, who, according to this, founded it, died two years after the taking of Babylon, and Cyrus the Persian succeeded him! The fact is, that it never for an instant had an independent existence, since from the very first it was Cyrus the Persian who governed in the name of Darius the Mede (or Cyaxarus). This latter reigned only in name. And that is precisely the meaning of the words in vi. 28, which describe one and the same empire, with two sovereigns reigning simultaneously. And, besides, what would be the meaning of the expression, "devour much flesh," as addressed to this supposed Median empire, which would only have lasted two years? Delitzsch replies: "It is the expression of a simple conatus, of a desire for conquest which was never realised." As if an unfulfilled desire could have been admitted into a prophetic picture in which history is sketched on so large a scale! Lastly, the impossibility of this interpretation is clear from v. 28, and vi. 12, which prove incontestably the identity of the two powers, of which it is desired to make distinct States: "Thy kingdom is given to the Medes and Persians;" and "the law of the Medes and Persians which altereth not." The bear then represents unquestionably the Medo-Persian monarchy. He supports himself on one side to signify that of the two nations which together constitute this empire, there is but one—the Persian—on which reposes the aggressive and conquering power of the monarchy. The three pieces of flesh, (or three ribs, E. V.) which the bear holds in his mouth, represent the chief conquests of this second great empire. Some have thought of Lydia, Babylonia, and Egypt; others substitute Phenicia for Egypt. Judging from viii. 3, 4, where the same kingdom is represented under the figure of a ram which had two horns, of which one (the Persian) was higher than the other (the Median), and which pushed with these horns in three directions, westward, northward, and southward, I incline rather to the belief that these conquered countries are Bactriana (in the north), Babylonia and Lydia (in the west), and Egypt (in the south).

The next beast, the leopard, with four wings of a bird, and four heads, answers to the "belly and thighs of brass" in the image; it can only represent Alexander the Great and the Macedonian kingdom, which took the place of the Medo-Persian empire. From this point of view the emblems indicated are easily explained. The four wings represent the extraordinary rapidity of this young king's conquests; and the four heads, the four contemporaneous kingdoms in which the Grecian monarchy makes its appearance on the stage of history. We know that these four states were, Macedonia, Thrace, Syria, and Egypt. The Grecian monarchy never existed in any other than this four-fold form after the premature death of its founder. Moreover, we find the literal explanation of these figures in chap. viii., where it is said of the he-goat coming from the west, which overthrew the ram with two horns (the Medo-Persian empire, v. 20): "the he-goat is the king of Grecia, and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king; now that being broken . . . four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation." Notwithstanding these evidences, all those who are determined not to recognise in the fourth beast the Roman monarchy, apply the figure of the leopard to Cyrus and the Persian monarchy. But, in the first place, this interpretation involves the application of the figure of the bear either to Belshazzar, or to a Median kingdom distinct from the Persian, two suppositions which we have found to be inadmissible; besides, how are we then to explain the four wings and four heads? what have these emblems to do with the Persian monarchy? Rapidity of conquest, which is signified by the four wings, was not the distinctive feature of the Medo-Persian empire, whilst it is the salient characteristic of Alexander's power. As to the four heads, they represent, it is pretended, the four first kings of Persia. This interpretation would be forced even if Persia had had but four kings; for the four heads must represent four contemporaneous and not four successive powers. They belong to the form of the beast from his first appearance. But, further, Persia had many more than four sovereigns. What are we to make of the two Artaxerxeses, Longimanus and Mnemon, and of the two last Dariuses, Ochus and Codoman? If the author writes as a prophet, how is it, we would ask Delitzsch, that he sees so dimly into the future? If he writes as a historian, that is to say as a prophet who composes after the event, how, we would ask the rationalists, can he be so completely ignorant of the history which he is telling? And how, from this point of view, are we to get out of the difficulty of viii. 21: "the he-goat (with four horns) is the king of Grecia?"

Lastly, appears the fourth beast, the beast without a name; this corresponds to the "legs of iron, and the feet, part of iron and part of clay," of the image. This parallelism cannot be questioned. This fourth beast devours and breaks in pieces just as the iron feet of the image break everything in pieces; the ten horns of the beast answer to the ten toes of the image; this fourth beast immediately precedes the Messianic kingdom, just as the image is smitten and overthrown by the little stone, emblem of the Messiah.—What is this last empire?

According to Delitzsch, Hitzig, and many others, it is that of Alexander, or the Grecian monarchy, which—to follow the first of these authors—is confounded in the prophetic vision with the Romans, and with all the succeeding powers until the judgment. But we have seen that Alexander and the Grecian empire have been already prefigured by the winged leopard with four heads. And from this point of view, what would be the meaning of the ten horns? We are told that these are the ten kings of Syria who succeeded one another, from the time of Alexander to that of Antiochus Epiphanes, in which the author himself lived. But we know that Syria had only seven kings before Antiochus Epiphanes; Selencus Nicator, Antiochus Soter, Antiochus Theos, Seleucus Callinicus, Seleucus Ceraunus, Antiochus the Great, and Seleucus Philopator. That is true, it will be answered, but there are three men who might have reigned, and whom Antiochus Epiphanes kept from the throne; Heliodorus, the poisoner of Epiphanes' predecessor, who did actually reign for a moment; Demetrius, the legitimate successor, who was kept at Rome as a hostage; and Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, who had claims upon the throne of Syria. But could sovereigns only by right, or by desire, be counted among real kings, and numbered among the active horns of the fourth beast? Besides, why should the Grecian monarchy be thus confined to the family of the Seleucidæ? Did it not also comprehend the dynasties of Macedonia, Thrace, and Egypt? To avoid these difficulties, it occurred to Zöckler to distinguish between Alexander himself, who, according to this, would be represented by the third beast, and the sum total of the states which succeeded him and which, taken together, are represented by the fourth. The ten horns only signifying the indefinite multitude of sovereigns of the four contemporaneous Grecian States. But these four Grecian kingdoms had been before evidently prefigured in the four heads of the leopard; how should they come suddenly to be reckoned as a separate beast? Besides, is it according to the analogy of the prophetic intuition to combine four distinct kingdoms into one beast? Lastly, what are we to think of the number ten, which is to represent the indefinite mass of Macedonian and Thracian sovereigns, the Ptolemies and Seleucidæ? This last attempt is evidently the resource of despair. After that, it becomes so much the more evident that the fourth beast, the beast without a name, represents a monarchy later than that of the Grecian power; an empire which shall comprehend the whole known world; which shall be divided into a number of states bound together by a link of solidarity (the ten horns); and which shall only give place to the kingdom of the Messiah. I leave it to the reader to decide whether these characteristics apply to the Roman monarchy or not.

But what are we to think of the connection between the little horn of chap. vii., which comes forth from this fourth beast, and the little horn of chap. viii., which belongs to the ram, the emblem of the Grecian empire? I see no reason why they should be identified. A little horn signifies in Daniel the concentration and explosion of the evil forces inherent in an organism. The third monarchy, according to chap. viii., was to produce an excrescence of this kind; and everything proves that this figure applies to Antiochus Epiphanes, the furious enemy of the Jews, of their religion, and of their God. The fourth and last monarchy, according to chap. vii., is to terminate also in the appearance of an analogous and still more destructive power. That which distinguishes it clearly from the other is the fact that it issues from the midst of the ten horns of the nameless beast^b, while the former comes forth from the four horns of the he-goat, which typifies the king of Grecia^c. We should say, then, to use the language of the New Testament, that the little horn of chap. vii. is Antichrist the man of sin (St. Paul), the beast of the Apocalypse (St. John), that power inimical to God and the Church, which will arise from the confederation of the European States, springing from the fourth monarchy; while that of chap. viii. represents Antiochus Epiphanes springing from the Grecian monarchy, who waged a corresponding war against the kingdom of God under the form of the Jewish theocracy.

There are then two declared adversaries of the kingdom of God indicated in the book of Daniel; one issuing from the third monarchy, attacking the people of the ancient covenant; the other from the fourth, making war against that of the new. If any one will read from this point of view chaps. vii. and viii. of the book of Daniel, he will find that the difficulties will vanish which have led learned men into the forced interpretations we have just refuted.

II.

The interpretations of the vision of the seventy weeks^d, which are opposed to our own, agree in this point, that they make the proper object of the prophetic picture, not Jesus Christ, His Sacrifice, the foundation of the Church, and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, but certain special events which took place in Israel rather less than two centuries before the Christian era. There was then a high-priest called Onias, who was assassinated about B.C. 170. He, according to most of the modern interpreters, is "the anointed, who shall be cut off," spoken of in ver. 26. This murder was accompanied by that of 40,000 Jews, and the pillage of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes. Three years afterwards, (here would be the half-week of ver. 27,) the temple was profaned by the institution of the worship of Jupiter Olympius, and the abolition of the daily sacrifice for three years and a half. Following upon these events described in his prophecy, the author would have expected the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. According to this, the prophet's horizon would not have comprehended more than the age of the Maccabees, whether we suppose that he lived at that time and prophesied ab eventu, as the rationalists pretend, or that a more distant future was not clearly revealed to him, as Delitzsch and others think.

^b vii. 8, 24.

^c viii. 9, 21.

^d chap. ix.

The question is complicated by the uncertainty as to the right interpretation of many expressions in the original text. We cannot now enter into details, but must confine ourselves to the essential points, which are, as it seems to us, the following:—

1. The expressions of Daniel: "the decree of desolation, the destruction of the city and of the sanctuary by the people of the prince that shall come," cannot apply to the time of the Maccabees, since the temple was not then destroyed, but only profaned.

2. The chronology offers, under this interpretation, insuperable difficulties. Seventy weeks make 490 years; now the return from the Captivity having taken place in 536, and the murder of Onias in 170 B.C., there are between these two events 366, not 490, years. The historic period would then be too short, if compared with the number indicated.

We are told in answer, that we are not to take as the starting-point of this period the return from the Captivity and the restoration of Jerusalem, but the year in which Jeremiah uttered the oracle which foretold these events, i.e. the year 605—the date of that remarkable prophecy, Jer. xxv. From 605 to 170, there are in fact 434 years, which make up the sixty-two weeks of which Daniel speaks, ix. 26. But in the first place, when mention is made in Dan. ix. 25 of “the commandment given to restore and to rebuild Jerusalem,” is it natural to understand by that the oracle of Jeremiah with regard to this restoration? Do not these expressions refer more naturally to the famous edict of Cyrus* which gives permission to the Jews to return to their own country and to rebuild their city, or, better still, to the Divine command which Cyrus executed? The edict took effect in the very same year in which it was issued; it is then between the restoration in 536 and the second destruction announced ver. 26, that we must place the interval indicated. In this way the prophecy will include, as it very naturally would, the whole duration of the state of things which was established at the restoration, the whole time of the existence of the second Jerusalem and the second temple. Then next, the number in Daniel amounts not only to sixty-two, but to sixty-nine weeks, if not even to seventy. Where are we to find the seven weeks which are left over, even according to this interpretation already devised on purpose to make room for this theory? For, lastly, between the oracle of Jeremiah (605) and the murder of Onias (170) there are only 434 years (62 weeks), and not 483 years (69 weeks). Here begin the tours de forces: (a.) Hitzig and others include the awkward period of the seven weeks in that of the sixty-two, placing it at the beginning of the latter. This would then be the half-century which elapsed between the ruin of

* Esdras i. 2, 4.

Jerusalem in 588 (or 586) and the appearance of Cyrus (in 536). But how is this? When it is said: 'From the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, unto Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks . . . and after threescore and two weeks the Anointed shall be cut off," it is allowable to suppose that the author intended to include the seven weeks within the sixty-two! And if this sleight of hand (pardon the expression) should be allowed, still how are we, even adopting that method of interpretation, to find the total number of seventy weeks mentioned in ver. 24: "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city." The seven weeks cannot find room in the sixty-two. For it is evident that the number seventy comprehends: 1. the group of the seven; 2. that of the sixty-two; 3. the final week. Consequently these groups are successive, not contemporaneous. (b.) Delitzsch and Hofmann, coming into direct collision with the order indicated by Daniel, place the seven weeks at the end of the sixty-two!—they are to represent the interval between Antiochus Epiphanes and Jesus Christ. But who will agree to such an overturning of the text? Besides, between Antiochus and Jesus Christ there was an interval of 164 years—not 49! (c.) Ewald has devised another expedient. The number 69 or 70 being evidently too large in all the interpretations which apply the prophecy to the time of the Maccabees, this author has proposed to deduct from the entire number all the Sabbatical years, i. e., one in seven, giving as his reason that this whole period is a time of oppression, while the idea of the sabbath always carries with it a feeling of joy. Thus we should have, 1. the seven weeks between the destruction of Jerusalem and the edict of Cyrus (587—538, according to Ewald's chronology); 2. the seventy weeks between the return from the Captivity and the year 175, when an "anointed one" was cut off (this anointed one being, according to Ewald, not Onias, but Seleucus Philopator, who died in 174, at the time when he was invading Judæa). These sixty-two weeks added to the seven (forty-nine years) would bring us to the year B.C. 105, instead of 175. But to help out this calculation comes in the deduction of the seventy sabbatical years, which brings the ship prosperously to the desired haven,—175. What are we to say of such monstrosities of exegesis! We will not urge all the other improbabilities to which this interpretation of the learned writer is exposed.

And these are the explanations over which one hears, even in the Revue des deux mondes, exclamations of triumph, as if the Messianic application of this wonderful prophecy had been completely and deservedly refuted by modern science! These attempts, so evidently vain, constitute the most complete demonstration possible of the absolute impossibility, according to any impartial exegesis, of applying this prophetic cycle of the seventy weeks to any other period than that which elapsed between the restoration of Jerusalem and the advent of the Christ,—of Him who, as Daniel says, “is to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most holy.” (ix. 24.)

END OF THE FIRST SERIES.

1115
.G58

Studies on the O.T.

518557

MAY 15 1963

WRM at the Qrr

NOV 21 1963

BS Godet 1115 Studies on the
.G58 O.T.

518557

NOV 21 1983

WR Mather - QUARTER

518557